PROSECUTION OF ELECTORAL FRAUD UNDER UNITED STATES FEDERAL LAW

– Prepared by Craig C. Donsanto¹

A. INTRODUCTION

This paper will explore the prosecution of election fraud in the United States Federal Judicial System. It was prepared to accompany remarks by the author at a series of seminars on electoral corruption and vote buying that took place in Abuja, Nigeria on January _____, 2006 through January ____ 2006.

The subjects covered in this paper include defining what sort of conduct is currently considered to be criminally actionable in the United States, the historical background for the role of the criminal prosecutor in this area of public corruption offense, and the various federal laws and judicial precedents that govern the prosecution of this type of crime in the United States.

In the United States, electoral administration is primarily a State rather than a federal responsibility. The federal government has authority over electoral matters only where:

- Federal candidates are standing for election in the election where a corrupt act occurs, or
- A federal instrumentality such as the United States Mails or interstate telecommunications facilities are employed to facilitate the fraud, or
- The fraud involves the necessary participation of election or other public officials “acting under color of law” in a manner that implicates the right to Due Process and Equal Protection guaranteed by the 124th Amendment to the United States Constitution, or
- The fraud is motivated by an intent to deprive to vote to classes of voters whose voting rights have been specifically and expressly secured by the United States Constitution, e.g. African-Americans, women, young people who have attained the age of 18, and certain language minorities.

Despite these significant limitations, the task of prosecuting crimes against electoral processes has historically fallen principally to the federal government. Thus, issues of “federalism” (i.e., in this paper the relation of federal to State authority over electoral matters) play a significant role in the overall criminal enforcement of election crimes. Although Nigeria is, like the United States, a federal republic, the extent to which the same federalism issues exist in there is not known to the author of this paper at the time it was prepared. But since these issues play such an important role in the prosecution of election crimes in the United States, they will be addressed, where appropriate, in this paper.

Finally, the United States follows a common law tradition in its jurisprudence. This means that the application of statutory laws to specific factual situations is interpreted by the Courts, and that these judicial decisions have precedential effect on future situations where the same statutes and laws are involved. The texts of the federal criminal laws dealing with electoral fraud that are discussed in this paper are presented in an Appendix. However, in the common law jurisprudential system that prevails in the United States, the meaning of a particular statutory text, and its application to a given set of facts, is governed not just by the statutes words but also how those words have been interpreted by the courts. For this reason, the discussion that follows contains annotations to the pertinent judicial and case authorities that give the statutes discussed the meanings the author has attributed to them in the text.

B. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Federal concern over the integrity of the franchise in the United States has historically had two distinct points of focus. One -- to secure to the general public elections that are not corrupted -- is the subject of this chapter. The other -- to ensure there is no discrimination against minorities at the ballot box -- involves entirely different constitutional and federal interests, and is supervised by the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division.

Federal interest in the integrity of the franchise was first manifested immediately after the Civil War. Between 1868 and 1870, Congress passed the Enforcement Acts, which served as the basis for federal activism in prosecuting corruption of the franchise until most of them were repealed in the 1890s. See In re Coy, 127 U.S. 731 (1888); Ex parte Yarborough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884); Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371 (1880).

Many of the Enforcement Acts had broad jurisdictional predicates which allowed them to be applied to a wide variety of corrupt election practices as long as a federal candidate was on the ballot. In Coy, the Supreme Court held that Congress had authority under the Constitution's Necessary and Proper Clause to regulate any activity during a mixed federal/state election which exposed the federal election to potential harm, whether that harm materialized or not. Coy is still good law. United States v. Carmichael, 685 F.2d 903, 908 (4th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1202 (1983); United States v. Mason, 673 F.2d 737, 739 (4th Cir. 1982); United States v. Malmay, 671 F.2d 869, 874-75 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Bowman, 636 F.2d 1003, 1001 (5th Cir. 1981); United States v. Cole, 41 F.3d 303 (7th Cir. 1994); United States v. McCrainie, 169 F.3d 763 (11th Cir. 1999).

After Reconstruction, federal activism in election matters retrenched. The repeal of most of the Enforcement Acts eliminated the statutory tools that had encouraged federal activism in election fraud matters. Two surviving provisions of these Acts, now embodied in 18 U.S.C. " 241 and 242, covered only intentional deprivations of rights guaranteed directly by the Constitution or federal law. The courts during this period held that the Constitution directly conferred a right to vote only for federal officers, and that conduct aimed at corrupting nonfederal contests was not prosecutable in federal courts. See United States v. Gradwell, 243 U.S. 476 (1917); Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347 (1915). Federal attention to election fraud was further limited by case law holding that primary elections were not part of the official election process, United States v. Newberry, 256 U.S. 232 (1918), and by cases like United States v. Bathgate, 246 U.S. 220 (1918), which read the entire subject of vote buying out of federal criminal law, even when it was directed at federal contests.

In 1941, the Supreme Court reversed direction, overturning Newberry. The Court recognized that primary elections are an integral part of the process by which candidates are elected to office. United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941). Classic changed the judicial attitude toward federal intervention in election matters, and ushered in a new period of federal activism. Federal courts now regard the right to vote in a fairly conducted election as a constitutionally protected feature of United States citizenship. Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

In 1973, the use of section 241 to address election fraud began to expand. United States v. Anderson, 481 F.2d 685 (4th Cir. 1973), aff'd on other grounds, 417 U.S. 211 (1974). Since then, this statute has been successfully applied to prosecute certain types of local election fraud. United States v. Howard, 774 F.2d 838 (7th Cir. 1985); United States v. Olinger, 759 F.2d 1293 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 839 (1985); United States v. Stollings, 501 F.2d 954 (4th Cir. 1974); United States v. Wadena, 152 F.3d 851 (8th Cir. 1998).²

The federal mail fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. ' 1341,³ was used successfully for decades to enable federal prosecutors to reach frauds that took place in purely local elections, under the theory that such schemes defrauded citizens of their right to fair and honest elections. United States v. Clapps, 732 F.2d 1148 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1085 (1984); United States v. States, 488 F.2d 761 (8th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 909 (1974). However, use of this mail fraud theory to address election fraud has been barred since 1987, when the Supreme Court held that the statute did not apply to schemes to defraud someone of intangible rights (such as the right to honest elections). McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350 (1987). Congress responded to McNally the following year by enacting a provision which specifically defined section 1341 to include schemes to defraud someone of "honest services." 18 U.S.C. ' 1346. However, unfortunately, section 1346 did not restore use of section 1341 for most election crimes, since they do not involve the element of "honest services."

Finally, over the past forty years Congress has enacted new criminal laws with broad jurisdictional bases to combat false registrations, vote buying, multiple voting, and fraudulent voting in elections where a federal candidate is on the ballot. 42 U.S.C. " 1973i(c), 1973i(e), 1973 gg-10. These statutes rest on Congress's power to regulate federal elections (art. I, § 4) and on its power under the Necessary and Proper Clause (art. I, § 8, cl. 18) to enact laws to protect the federal election process from the potential of corrupt abuse. The federal jurisdictional predicate underlying these statutes is satisfied as long as either the name of a federal candidate is on the ballot or the fraud involves corruption of the voter registration process in a state where one registers to vote simultaneously for federal as well other offices. Bowman, Malmay, Mason, supra; United States v. Garcia, 719 F.2d 99 (5th Cir. 1983); United States v. 411 F3d 643 (6th Cir. 2005); United States v. Olinger, 759 F.2d 1293 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 839 (1985); United States v. Howard, 774 F.2d 838 (7th Cir. 1985); United States v. McCrainie, 169F.3d 723 (11th Cir. 1999); United States v. Barker, 514 F.2d 1077 (7th Cir. 1975); United States v. Ciancuilli, 482 F.Supp. 585 (E.D. PA. 1979).

³The Mail Fraud statute was enacted originally in 1872. It prohibits using the United States Mail, which in the United States is a federal instrumentality over which the federal Congress has legislative jurisdiction, to further "schemes to defraud." Its original purpose was to prevent the mails from being used to further schemes to defraud victims of money. However, over the ensuing decades, federal courts in the United States interpreted the words "scheme to defraud" as used in this statute to encompass many additional varieties of dishonest behavior, including most activities aimed at corrupting elections.

C. WHAT IS ELECTION FRAUD? (Defining the Term)

1. In General

Election fraud involves a substantive irregularity relating to the voting act -- such as bribery, intimidation, or forgery -- which has the potential to taint the election itself. During the past century and a half, Congress and the federal courts have articulated the following constitutional principles concerning the right to vote in the United States. Any activity intended to interfere corruptly with any of these principles may be actionable as a federal crime:

- All qualified citizens are eligible to vote.
- All qualified voters have the right to have their votes counted fairly and honestly.
- Invalid ballots dilute the worth of valid ballots and therefore will not be counted.
- Every qualified voter has the right to make a personal and independent election decision.
- Qualified voters may opt not to participate in an election.
- Voting shall not be influenced by bribery or intimidation.

Simply put, then, election fraud⁴ is conduct intended to corrupt:

- (a) the process by which elections are conducted and ballots are obtained, marked, or tabulated;
- (b) the process by which election results are canvassed and certified; or
- (c) the process by which voters are registered.

On the other hand, schemes that involve corruption of other political processes (i.e., political campaigning, circulation of nominating petitions, awarding public works projects to otherwise deserving objects on the eve of elections, transporting voters to the polls, etc.) do not normally serve as the basis for a federal election crime.

2. Conduct that constitutes federal election fraud⁵

The following activities provide a basis for federal prosecution under the statutes referenced in each category:

Paying voters to register to vote, or to participate in elections, where a federal candidate is on the ballot (42 U.S.C. § 1973i(c), 18 U.S.C. § 597), or through the use of the mails in those states where vote buying is a "bribery" offense (18 U.S.C. § 1952), as well as in federal elections⁶ in those States where purchased registrations or votes are void under applicable state election law (42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10). In the United States, the crime of vote buying is confined to situations where something of pecuniary value is offered or given to an individual for the purpose of stimulating or rewarding participation in elections. It does not cover the theft or use of government resources to advance electoral ends, although such conduct can be prosecuted under other prosecutive theories dealing with theft, embezzlement or fraud.

⁴ Whether any of these types of election fraud is actionable under federal criminal law is discussed below.

- Preventing voters from participating in elections where a federal candidate is on the ballot, or when done "under color of law" in any election, federal or nonfederal (18 U.S.C. §§ 241, 242).
- Voting for individuals in federal elections who do not personally participate in, and assent to, the voting act attributed to them, or impersonating voters or casting ballots in the names of voters who do not vote in federal elections (42 U.S.C. §§ 1973i(c), 1973i(e), 1973gg-10).
- Intimidating voters through physical duress in any type of election (18 U.S.C. § 245(b)(1)(A)), or through physical or economic threats in connection with their registering to vote or their voting in federal elections (42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10), or to vote for a federal candidate (18 U.S.C. § 594). If the victim is a federal employee, intimidation in connection with any election, federal or non-federal, is covered (18 U.S.C. § 610).
- Malfeasance by election officials acting "under color of law" to do such things as dilute valid ballots with invalid ones (ballot-box stuffing), render false tabulations of votes, or prevent valid voter registrations or votes from being given effect in any election, federal or nonfederal (18 U.S.C. §§ 241, 242), as well as in elections where federal candidates are on the ballot (42 U.S.C. § 1973i(c), 1973i(e), 1973gg-10).

- Submitting fictitious names on voter registration rolls and thereby qualifying the ostensible voters to vote in any election, nonfederal or federal (42 U.S.C. §§ 1973i(c), 1973gg-10).⁷
- Knowingly procuring eligibility to vote for federal office by persons who are not entitled to the vote under applicable state law, notably persons who have committed serious crimes (approximately 40 states)(42 U.S.C. §§ 1973i(c), 1973gg-10), and persons who are not United States citizens (currently all states)(42 U.S.C. §§ 1973i(c), 1973gg-10; 18 U.S.C. §§ 1015(f) and 611).
- Knowingly making a false claim of United States citizenship to register to vote or to vote in any election (18 U.S.C. § 1015(f)), or falsely and willfully claiming US citizenship for, inter alia registering or voting in any election (18 U.S.C. § 911).
- Providing false information concerning a person's name, address, or period of residence in a voting district in order to establish that person's eligibility to register or to vote in a federal election (42 U.S.C. §§ 1973i(c), 1973gg-10).
- Causing the production of voter registrations that qualify alleged voters to vote for federal candidates, or the production of ballots in federal elections, that the actor knows are materially defective under applicable state law (42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10).

⁷ The criminal statutes addressing registration fraud are confined to those committed in registering to vote for federal candidates. However, election registration is "unitary" in all 50 States in the sense that a person registers only once to become eligible to cast ballots for both federal and non-federal candidates. Therefore false information given to establish eligibility to register to vote is actionable federally regardless of the type of election that motivated the subjects to act. See, e.g., United States v. Ciancuilli, 482 F. Supp. 585 (E.D. Pa. 1979).

- Using the United States mails, or interstate wire facilities, to obtain the salary and emoluments of an elected official through any of the activities mentioned above (18 U.S.C. §§ 1341, 1343). At the time this article was written, this so-called "salary theory" of mail and wire fraud had not yet received wide judicial support. However, where it has been accepted, it does permit federal prosecutive jurisdiction to be asserted over an election fraud scheme based on the use of a federal instrumentality to carry it out, and regardless of the type of election involved: federal or nonfederal.⁸
- Ordering, keeping, or having under one's authority or control any troops or armed men at any polling place in any election, federal or nonfederal. The actor must be an active civilian or military officer or employee of the United States government. (18 U.S.C. § 592).

3. Conduct that does not constitute federal election fraud

Various types of conduct that might adversely affect the election of a federal candidate may not constitute federal election crimes, despite what in many instances may be their reprehensible character. For example, a federal election crime does not normally involve irregularities relating the accuracy of campaign literature, campaigning too close to the polls, the process by which a candidate obtains the withdrawal of an opponent, transporting voters to the polls, and the negligent failure of election officers to comply with state-mandated voting procedures.

Also, "facilitation payments," that is things of value given to voters to make it easier for the voter to cast a ballot but which are not intended to stimulate or reward the voting act itself (e.g., a ride to the polls, a stamp to mail in an absentee ballot) do not ordinarily involve a federal crime. Examples who have already made up their minds to vote Federal election crime.

Finally, it is not a federal crime in the United States to time the award of otherwise justified public works projects of other similar government programs close to elections, or to target such government grants to areas where the political competition is considered to be "close." The crime of "vote buying" in the United States is confined to giving something of pecuniary value, or offering to give something of pecuniary value, to individual voters in order to stimulate recipient to, or reward the recipient for, participating in voting activity. However, where the sole reason for a public grant award can be proven to have been to advance the electoral prospects of the incumbent political party, ad for example where there is no valid [public justification for a grant award other than achieving partisan political advantage, federal offenses can arise.

4. Conditions conducive to election fraud

Most election fraud is aimed at corrupting elections for local offices, which control or influence patronage positions. Election fraud schemes are thus often linked to such other crimes as protection of illegal activities, corruption of local governmental processes, and patronage abuses.

Election fraud does not normally occur in jurisdictions where one political faction enjoys widespread support among the electorate, because in such a situation it is usually unnecessary or impractical to resort to election fraud

⁸ The "McNally-fix" statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1346, did not restore use of the mail and wire statutes for election fraud schemes because its "intangible rights" concept is confined to schemes that involve a "deprivation of honest services," a motive not usually found in election fraud schemes. Thus, the utility of these statutes to address election fraud generally is confined to schemes where the proof shows that the defendant intended, as an objective of the scheme, to obtain for the "favored" candidate the salary and emoluments of an elected position. See generally, United States v. Webb, 689 F. Supp. 703 (W.D. Ky. 1988); Ingber v. Enzor, 664 F. Supp. 814 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 841 F.2d 450 (2d Cir. 1988).

WIKI SOURCE: https://www.wikisource.org/wiki/United_States_Federal_Law

in order to control local public offices. Instead, election fraud occurs most frequently where there are fairly equal political factions, and where the stakes involved in who controls public offices are weighty -- as is often the case where patronage jobs are a major source of employment, or where illicit activities are being protected from law enforcement scrutiny. In sum, election fraud is most likely to occur in electoral jurisdictions where there is close factional competition for an elected position that matters.

5. Voter participation versus non-voter participation cases

As a practical matter, election frauds fall into two basic categories: those in which individual voters do not participate in the fraud, and those in which they do. The investigative approach and prosecutive potential are different for each type of case.

a) Election frauds not involving the participation of voters

The first category involves cases where voters do not participate, in any way, in the voting act attributed to them. These cases include ballot box stuffing, ghost voting, and "nursing home" frauds.⁹ All such matters are potential federal crimes. Proof of these crimes depends largely on evidence generated by the voting process, or on handwriting exemplars taken from persons who had access to voting equipment and thus the opportunity to misuse it. Some of the more common ways these crimes are committed include:

- Placing fictitious names on the voter rolls. This "deadwood" allows for fraudulent ballots, which can be used to stuff the ballot box.
- Casting bogus votes in the names of persons who did not vote.
- Obtaining and marking absentee ballots without the active input of the voters involved. Absentee ballots are particularly susceptible to fraudulent abuse because, by definition, they are marked and cast outside the presence of election officials.
- Falsifying vote tallies.

b) Election frauds involving the participation of voters

The second category of election frauds includes cases in which the voters do participate, at least to some extent, in the voting acts attributed to them. Common examples include:

- Vote buying schemes.

⁹ An example of a nursing home fraud is United States v. Odom, 736 F.2d 104 (4th Cir. 1984), which involved a scheme by local law enforcement officials and others to vote the absentee ballots of mentally incompetent residents of a nursing home.

- Absentee ballot frauds.
- Voter intimidation schemes.
- Migratory-voting (or floating-voter) schemes.
- Voter "assistance" frauds, in which the wishes of the voters are ignored or not sought by an offender who purports to be "helping" the voter vote.

Successful prosecution of these cases usually requires the cooperation and testimony of the voters whose ballots were corrupted. This requirement presents several difficulties. An initial problem is that the voters themselves may be technically guilty of participating in the scheme. However, because these voters can often be considered victims, the Justice Department has adopted a practice of declining to prosecute them.

The second difficulty encountered in cases where voters participate is a more significant hurdle. Any participation by the voter, no matter how slight, may preclude prosecution or make its success less likely. The voter's presence alone may suggest that he or she "consented" to the defendant's conduct (marking the ballot, taking the ballot, choosing the candidates, etc.). Compare United States v. Salisbury, 983 F.2d 1369 (6th Cir. 1993) (leaving unanswered the question whether a voter who signs a ballot envelope at the defendant's instruction but is not allowed to choose the candidates has consented to having the defendant mark his or her ballot), with United States v. Cole, 41 F.3d 303 (7th Cir. 1994) (finding that voters who merely signed ballots subsequently marked by the defendant were not expressing their own electoral preferences).

While the presence of the ostensible voter when another marks his or her ballot does not negate whatever crime might be occurring, it may increase the difficulty of proving the crime. This difficulty is compounded by the fact that those who commit this type of crime generally target vulnerable members of society, such as persons who are uneducated, socially disadvantaged, or with little means of livelihood -- precisely the type of person who is likely to be subject to manipulation or intimidation. Therefore, in cases where the voter is present when another person marks his or her ballot, the evidence must show that the defendant either procured the voter's ballot through means that were themselves corrupt (such as bribery or threats), or that the defendant marked the voter's ballot without the voter's consent or input. See United States v. Boards, 10 F.3d 587 (8th Cir. 1993); Salisbury; Cole.

D. STATUTES¹⁰

1. Conspiracy against rights: 18 U.S.C. 241

Section 241 makes it unlawful for two or more persons to "conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any person in any state, territory or district in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States." Violations are punishable by imprisonment for up to ten years or, if death results, for any term of years or for life.

The Supreme Court long ago recognized that the right to vote for federal offices is among the rights secured by Article I, Sections 2 and 4, of the Constitution, and hence is protected by section 241. United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941); Ex parte Yarborough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884). Although the statute was enacted just after the Civil War to address efforts to deprive the newly emancipated slaves of the basic rights of citizenship, such as the right to vote, it has been interpreted to include any effort to derogate any right which flows from the Constitution or from federal law.

Section 241 has been an important statutory tool in election crime prosecutions. Originally held to apply only to schemes to corrupt elections for federal office, it has recently been successfully applied to non-federal elections as well, provided that state action was a necessary feature of the fraud. This state action requirement can be met not only by the participation of poll officials, but by the activities of persons who clothe themselves with the appearance of state authority by dressing like an authority figure, such as with uniforms, credentials, and badges. Williams v. United States, 341 U.S. 97 (1951).

Section 241 embraces conspiracies to stuff a ballot box with forged ballots, United States v. Saylor, 322 U.S. 385 (1944); United States v. Mosley, 238 U.S. 383 (1915); to impersonate qualified voters, Crolich v. United States, 196 F.2d 879 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 344 U.S. 830 (1952); to alter legal ballots, United States v. Powell, 81 F. Supp. 288 (E.D. Mo. 1948); to fail to count votes and to alter votes counted, Ryan v. United States, 99 F.2d 864 (8th Cir. 1938), cert. denied, 306 U.S. 635 (1939); Walker v. United States, 93 F.2d 383 (8th Cir. 1937), cert. denied, 303 U.S. 644 (1938); to prevent the official count of ballots in primary elections, Classic; to destroy ballots, United States v. Townsley, 843 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1988); to destroy voter registration applications, United States v. Haynes, 977 F.2d 583 (6th Cir. 1992) (table)(available at 1992 WL 296782); to illegally register voters and cast absentee ballots in their names, United States v. Weston, 417 F.2d 181 (4th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1062 (1970); United States v. Morado, 454 F.2d 167 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 406 U.S. 917 (1972); Fields v. United States, 228 F.2d 544 (4th Cir. 1955), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 982 (1956); and to injure, threaten, or intimidate a voter in the exercise of his right to vote, Wilkins v. United States, 376 F.2d 552 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 964 (1967).

The election fraud conspiracy need not be successful to violate this statute. United States v. Bradberry, 517 F.2d 498 (7th Cir. 1975). Nor need there be proof of an overt act. Williams v. United States, 179 F.2d 644 (5th Cir. 1950), aff'd on other grounds, 341 U.S. 70 (1951); Morado. Section 241 reaches conduct affecting the integrity of the federal election process as a whole, and does not require fraudulent action with respect to any particular voter. United States v. Nathan, 238 F.2d 401 (7th Cir. 1956), cert. denied, 353 U.S. 910 (1957).

On the other hand, section 241 does not reach schemes to corrupt the balloting process through voter bribery, United States v. Bathgate, 246 U.S. 220 (1918), even schemes that involve poll officers to ensure that the bribed voters mark their ballots as they were paid to, United States v. McLean, 808 F.2d 1044 (4th Cir. 1987) (noting, however, that section 241 may apply where vote buying occurs in conjunction with other corrupt practices, such as ballot box stuffing).

Section 241 prohibits only conspiracies to interfere with rights flowing directly from the Constitution or federal statutes. This element has led to considerable judicial speculation over the extent to which the Constitution protects the right to vote for candidates running for nonfederal offices. Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964); Blitz v. United States, 153 U.S. 308 (1894); In re Coy, 127 U.S. 731 (1888); Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371 (1880). See also Duncan v. Poythress, 657 F.2d 691 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. dismissed, 459 U.S. 1012 (1982). While dicta in Reynolds casts the parameters of the federally protected right to vote in extremely broad terms, in a ballot fraud case ten years later the Supreme Court specifically refused to decide whether the federally secured franchise extended to nonfederal contests. Anderson v. United States, 417 U.S. 211 (1974).

The use of section 241 in election fraud cases has generally been confined to two types of situations: "public schemes" and "private schemes."

A public scheme is one which involves the necessary participation of a public official acting under the color of law. In election fraud cases, the public official involved in the scheme is usually an election officer whose participation involves corruption of his office to dilute valid ballots with invalid ballots or to otherwise corrupt an honest vote tally in derogation of the equal protection and due process clauses of the 14th Amendment. See, e.g. United States v. Anderson, 482 F.2d 685 (4th Cir. 1973, aff'd on other grounds, 417 U.S. 211 (1974)); United States v. Stollings, 501 F.2d 954 (4th Cir. 1974); United States v. Olinger, 759 F.2d 1293 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 839(1985) United States v. Howard, 774 F.2d 838 (7th Cir. 1985); United States v. Townsley, 843 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1988); United States v. Haynes, 799 F.2d 583 (6th Cir. 1992)(table)(available at 1992 WL 296782). Another case involving a public scheme turned on the necessary participation of a notary public who falsely notarized forged voter signatures on absentee ballot materials in an Indian tribal election. United States v. Wadena, 152 F.3d 831 (8th Cir. 1998), cert. denied, 526 U.S. 517 (1999).

A private scheme is a pattern of voter fraud which does not involve the necessary participation of a public official acting under color of law, but which can be shown factually to have adversely affected the ability of qualified voters to vote in elections where federal candidates were on the ballot. Examples of private schemes include voting fraudulent ballots in mixed elections, and schemes to thwart get-out-the-vote or ride-to-the-polls activities of political factions or parties through such methods as jamming telephone lines or vandalizing motor vehicles.

Public schemes may be prosecuted under section 241 regardless of the nature of the election with respect to which the conspiracy occurs, that is, elections with or without a federal candidate. On the other hand, private schemes can be prosecuted under section 241 only when the objective of the conspiracy was to corrupt a federal election or when the scheme can be shown to have affected, directly or indirectly, the vote count for a federal candidate, as for example would occur where fraudulent ballots were cast for an entire party ticket that included a federal office.

2. Deprivation of rights under color of law: 18 U.S.C. § 242

Section 242, also enacted as a post-Civil War statute, makes it unlawful for anyone acting under color of law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to willfully deprive a person of any right, privilege, or immunity secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States. Violations are misdemeanors unless bodily injury occurs, in which case the penalty is ten years, or unless death results, in which case imprisonment may be for any term of years or for life.

Prosecutions under section 242 need not show the existence of a conspiracy. However, the defendants must have acted illegally "under color of law", i.e., the case must involve a public scheme, as discussed above. This element does not require that the defendant be a de jure officer or a government official; it is sufficient if he or she jointly acted with state agents in committing the offense, United States v. Price, 383 U.S. 787 (1966), or if his or her actions were made possible by the fact that they were clothed with the authority of state law, United States v. Williams, 341 U.S. 97 (1951); United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941).

Because a section 242 violation can be a substantive offense for election fraud conspiracies prosecutable under section 241, the cases cited in the discussion of section 241 apply to section 242.

3. False information in, and payments for, registering and voting: 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(c)

Section 1973i(c) makes it unlawful, in an election in which a federal candidate is on the ballot, to knowingly and willfully (1) give false information as to name, address, or period of residence to an election official for the purpose of establishing one's eligibility to register or to vote; (2) pay, offer to pay, or accept payment for registering to vote or for voting; or (3) conspire with another person to vote illegally. Violations are punishable by imprisonment for up to five years.

a) The basis for federal jurisdiction¹¹

Congress added section 1973i(c) to the 1965 Voting Rights Act to ensure the integrity of the balloting process in the context of an expanded franchise. In so doing, Congress intended that section 1973i(c) have a broad reach. In fact, the original version of section 1973i(c) would have applied to all elections. However, because of constitutional concerns raised during congressional debate on the bill, the provision's scope was narrowed to elections including a federal contest. Section 1973i(c) rests Congress's power to regulate federal elections and on the Necessary and Proper Clause. U.S. Const. art. I, '4, art. I § 8, cl. 18. United States v. Slone, 411 F.3d 643 (5th Cir. 2005); United States v. Bowman, 636 F.2d 1003 (5th Cir. 1981); United States v. Malmay, 671 F.2d 869 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Carmichael, 685 F.2d 903 (4th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1202 (1983); United States v. Cole, 41 F.3d 303 (7th Cir. 1994); United States v. McCranie, 169 F.3d 723 (11th Cir. 1999); and United States v. Cianciulli, 482 F. Supp. 585 (E.D. Pa. 1979).

Section 1973i(c) has been held to protect two distinct aspects of a federal election: the actual results of the election, and the integrity of the process of electing federal officials. United States v. Cole, 41 F.3d 303 (7th Cir. 1994). In Cole, the court held that federal jurisdiction is satisfied so long as single federal candidate is on the ballot -- even if the federal candidate is unopposed -- because fraud in a mixed election automatically has an impact of the integrity of the election. See also United States v. McCranie, 169 F.3d 723 (11th Cir. 1999), and United States v. Slone, 411 F.3d 643 (6th cir. 2005), both of which followed Cole and achieved the same result.

Section 1973i(c) is particularly useful for two reasons. It eliminates the unresolved issue of the scope of the constitutional right to vote in matters not involving racial discrimination, and eliminates the need to prove that a given pattern of corrupt conduct had an actual impact on a federal election. It is sufficient under section 1973i(c) that a pattern of corrupt conduct took place during a mixed election; in that situation it is presumed that the fraud will expose the federal race to potential harm. Slone, supra, Cole, supra; United States v. Olinger, 759 F.2d 1293 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 839 (1985); United States v. Saenz, 747 F.2d 930 (5th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 473 U.S. 906 (1985); United States v. Garcia, 719 F.2d 99 (5th Cir. 1983); United States v. Carmichael, 685 F.2d 903 (4th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1202 (1983); United States v. Mason, 673 F.2d 737 (4th Cir. 1982); United States v. Malmay, 671 F.2d 869 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Bowman, 636 F.2d 1003 (5th Cir. 1981); United States v. Sayre, 522 F. Supp. 973 (W.D. Mo. 1981); United States v. Simms, 508 F. Supp. 1179 (W.D. La. 1979).

Cases arising under this statute which involve corruption of the process by which individuals register to vote, as distinguished from the circumstances under which they actually vote, present a different federal jurisdictional issue, which is easily satisfied. This is because voter registration in every State in the United States is "unitary" in the sense that one registers to vote only once in order to become eligible to vote for all candidates on the ballot, local, state, and federal. Although a state could choose to maintain separate registration lists for federal and non-federal elections, at the time this book was written no state had chosen to do so. Consequently, any corrupt act which impacts on the voter registration process and which can be reached under 42 U.S.C. 1973i(c) satisfies this federal jurisdictional requirement. An excellent discussion of this issue is contained in United States v. Ciancuilli, 462 F. Supp. 585 (E.D. Pa. 1979).

b) False information to an election official

The "false information" provision of section 1973i(c) prohibits any person from furnishing certain false data to an election official to establish eligibility to register or vote. The statute applies to only three types of information: name, address, and period of residence in the voting district. False information concerning other factors (such as citizenship, felon status, and mental competence) are not covered by this provision.¹²

As just discussed, registration to vote is "unitary," in that a single registration qualifies the applicant to cast ballots for all elections. Thus, the jurisdictional requirement that the false information have been made to establish eligibility to vote in a federal election is satisfied automatically wherever a false statement is made to get one's name on the registration rolls. United States v. Barker, 514 F.2d 1077 (7th Cir. 1975); Ciancuilli, supra.

On the other hand, where the false data is furnished to poll officials for the purpose of enabling a voter to cast a ballot in a particular election (as when one voter attempts to impersonate another), it must be shown that a federal candidate was being voted upon at the time. In such situations, the evidence should show that the course of fraudulent conduct could have jeopardized the integrity of the federal race, or, at a minimum, that the name of a federal candidate was on the ballot. Carmichael, Bowman, Malmay, McCrainie, supra. See, e.g., In re Coy, 127 U.S. 731 (1888). Situations involving a voter impersonating another in order to vote for a non-federal candidate may be inadequate to establish federal jurisdiction. See Blitz v. United States, 153 U.S. 308 (1894).

In United States v. Boards, 10 F.3d 587 (8th Cir. 1993), the Eighth Circuit confirmed the broad reach of the "false information" provision of section 1973i(c). The defendants in this case, and their unidentified coconspirators, had obtained and marked the absentee ballots of other registered voters by forging the voters' names on ballot applications and directing that the ballots be sent to a post office box without the voters' knowledge. The district court granted post-verdict judgments of acquittal as to those counts in which the defendant's role was limited to fraudulently completing an application for an absentee ballot, based on its conclusions that (1) the statute did not extend to ballot applications, (2) the statute did not cover giving false information as to the names of real voters (as opposed to fictitious names), and (3) the defendants could not be convicted for completing the applications when others actually voted the ballots.

The Court of Appeals rejected each of these narrow interpretations of section 1973i(c). It held that an application for a ballot falls within the broad definition of "vote" in the Voting Rights Act, "because an absentee voter must first apply for an absentee ballot as a 'prerequisite to voting.'" 10 F.3d at 589 (quoting 42 U.S.C. ' 1973i(c)(1)). The Court also held that by using the names of real registered voters on the applications, the defendants "[gave] false information as to [their] name[s]" within the meaning of section 1973i(c). Id. Finally, the Court held that one of the defendants, whose role was limited to completing absentee ballot applications for ballots that others fraudulently voted, was liable under 18 U.S.C. ' 2 as an aider and abettor.

In United States v. Smith, 231 F.3d 800 (11th Cir. 2000), the Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit held that each forgery of a voter's name on a ballot document or on an application for a ballot constituted a separate offense under the "false information as to name" clause of section 1973i(c).

Section 1973i(c)'s false information clause is particularly useful when the evidence shows that a voter's signature (name) was forged on an election-related document; e.g., when signatures on poll lists are forged by election officials who are stuffing a ballot box, when a voter's signature on an application for an absent ballot is forged, or where bogus voter registration documents are fabricated in order to get names on voter registries.

c) Commercialization of the vote -- Vote Buying

Vote buying is a particularly pernicious, and in some parts of the United States relatively common, type of electoral crime. This is because the cornerstone of "democracy," as that concept is generally understood in the United States, is that the governors serve the governed, and that they are held accountable to the people for their public stewardship of the public's affairs through the ballot box. Vote buying attacks that critical dynamic at its core. Those who are targets of vote buying schemes never include the powerful, the rich or the privileged. Rather, vote buying targets the poor, the dispossessed, the socially dependent and the culturally challenged. Yet those are precisely the people who need the vote the most! Where vote buying occurs, the political debt that the public officials involved owe to such citizens is discharged up front and usually in cash. As long as politicians are confident that they can win elections by giving voters small gifts to get them to the polls or to reward them for voting, those politicians have absolutely no motive or reason to be responsive to the usually very real needs of the challenged segment of society whose votes have been bought.

For this reason, vote buying offenses, as discussed more fully below, have represented a sizable segment of the federal election crime docket in modern times.

The clause of section 1973i(c) that prohibits "vote buying" does so in broad terms, covering any payment made or offered to a would-be voter "to vote or for voting" in an election where the name of a federal candidate appears on the ballot, as well as payments made to induce unregistered persons to register.¹³ Section 1973i(c) applies as long as a pattern of vote buying exposes a federal election to potential corruption, even though it cannot be shown that the threat materialized.

This aspect of section 1973i(c) is directed at eliminating pecuniary considerations from the voting process. Garcia; Mason; Malmay; Bowman, supra. The statute rests on the premises that potential voters can choose not to vote; that those who choose to vote have a right not to have the voting process diluted with ballots that have been procured through bribery; and that the selection of the nation's leaders should not degenerate into a spending contest, with the victor being the candidate who can pay the most voters. See also United States v. Blanton, 77 F. Supp. 812, 816 (E.D. Mo. 1948).

The payment may be anything having monetary value, including cash, liquor, lottery chances, and welfare benefits such as food stamps. Garcia, 719 F.2d at 102. However, offering free rides to the polls or providing employees paid leave while they vote are not prohibited. United States v. Lewin, 467 F.2d 1132 (7th Cir.

¹³ The federal criminal code contains another vote buying statute, 18 U.S.C. § 597, which has a narrower scope and provides for lesser penalties than section 1973i(c). Section 597 prohibits making or offering to make an expenditure to any person to vote or withhold his or her vote for a federal candidate. Nonwillful violations of section 597 are one-year misdemeanors; willful violations are two-year felonies. Sections 597 and 1973i(c) are distinct offenses, since each requires proof of an element that the other does not. Whalen v. United States, 445 U.S. 684 (1980); Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932). Section 597 requires that the payment be made to influence a federal election; section 1973i(c) requires that the defendant have acted "knowingly and willfully." Section 597 is primarily useful in plea negotiations as an alternative to section 1973i(c).

1972). Such things are given to make it easier for people to vote, not to induce them to do so. This distinction is important. For an offer or a payment to violate section 1973i(c) it must have been intended to induce or reward the voter for engaging in one or more acts necessary to cast a ballot. Section 1973i(c) does not prohibit offering or giving things having theoretical pecuniary value, such as a ride to the polls or time off from work, to individuals who have already made up their minds to vote solely to facilitate their doing so.

Moreover, payments made for some purpose other than to induce or reward voting activity, such as remuneration for campaign work, do not violate this statute. See United States v. Canales, 744 F.2d 413 (5th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 473 U.S. 906 (1985). Similarly, section 1973i(c) does not apply to payments made to signature-gatherers for voter registrations such individuals may obtain, a practice sometimes referred to as "bounty hunting." Such payments become actionable under section 1973i(c) only if they are shared with the person being registered.

The federal crime of vote buying in the United States also does not cover the interjection of partisan political considerations into an otherwise legally defensible award of government grants or benefits to a body politic. For example, it is not a "vote buying" crime in the United States for an incumbent administration to award a road construction project to a geographic area that is view as being politically competitive, provided that there is an otherwise objective valid public need for the project. Vote buying in the United States is personal in nature, in the sense that the benefit that represents the corpus of the corrupt payment must have been offered or accepted to an individual voter rather than non-personally to a segment of a body politic.

The improper use of state resources for partisan political purposes also does not violate the vote buying provisions of Section 1973i(c). However, embezzling state resources or assets by allowing them to be used by political candidates or parties to further campaigning activities can be prosecuted under criminal laws dealing with embezzlement and theft of government property.

Finally, section 1973i(c) does not require that the offer or payment have been made with a specific intent to influence a federal contest - - or for that matter that it was offered or given to influence votes cast for any particular candidate or party. It is sufficient that the name of a federal candidate appeared on the ballot in the election where the payment or offer of payment occurred, and that the payment or offer fo payment have been "for voting" as distinguished from some other sort of activity. Slone (payments to influence vote for county judge executive); Garcia (providing food stamps to influence vote for candidates running for county judge and county commissioner); United States v. Thompson, 615 F.2d 329 (5th Cir. 1980), Carmichael, Mason, Sayre (payments to influence votes for candidates running for sheriff or other local offices); Simms (payments to vote for a state judicial post); Malmay (payments to vote for school board member); United States v. Odom, 858 F.2d 664 (11th Cir. 1988)(payments for votes for a state representative); United States v. Campbell, 845 F.2d 782 (8th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 965 (1989)(payments to benefit a candidate for county judge); United States v. Daugherty, 952 F.2d 969 (8th Cir. 1991) (payments to vote for a number of local candidates); McCrainie (payments to influence election for sheriff where the name of an unopposed federal candidate appeared on the ballot).

d) Conspiracy to cause illegal voting

The second clause of section 1973i(c) criminalizes conspiracies to encourage "illegal voting." The phrase "illegal voting" is not defined in the statute. On its face it encompasses unlawful conduct in connection with voting. Violations of this provision are felonies.

The "illegal voting" clause of section 1973i(c) has potential application to those who undertake to cause others to register or vote in conscious derogation of state or federal laws. Cianciulli, 482 F. Supp. at 616 (noting that this clause would prohibit "vot[ing] illegally in an improper election district"). For example, all states require voters to be United States citizens, and most states disenfranchise people who have been convicted of certain crimes, who are mentally incompetent, or who possess other disabilities which may warrant restriction of the right to vote.¹⁴

This provision requires that the voter have been a participant in the conspiracy. Cases brought under this clause thus should include proof that the voter was actively aware that he or she was not eligible to vote and was registering or voting illegally. However, the statute criminalizes only the conduct of the person who encourages an ineligible voter to register or an eligible voter to vote illegally -- not the conduct of the voter.

The conspiracy provision of section 1973i(c) applies only to the statute's "illegal voting" clause. Olinger, 759 F.2d at 1298-1300. Conspiracies arising under the other clauses of section 1973i(c) (that is, those involving vote buying or fraudulent registration) should be charged under the general federal conspiracy statute, 18 U.S.C. § 371.

4. Voting more than once: 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(e)

Section 1973i(e), enacted as part of the 1975 amendments to the Voting Rights Act of 1965, makes it a crime to vote "more than once" in any election in which a federal candidate is on the ballot. Violations are punishable by imprisonment for up to five years.

The federal jurisdictional basis for this statute is identical to that for 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(c), which is discussed in detail in the previous item.

Section 1973i(e) is most useful as a statutory weapon against frauds which do not involve the participation of voters in the balloting acts attributed to them. Examples of such frauds are schemes to cast ballots in the names of voters who were deceased or absent, United States v. Olinger, 759 F.2d 1293 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 839 (1985); schemes to exploit the infirmities of the mentally handicapped by casting ballots in their names. United States v. Odom, 736 F.2d 104 (4th Cir. 1984); and schemes to cast absentee ballots in the names of voters who did not participate in and consent to the marking of their ballots by the offender. United States v. Smith, 231 F.3d 800 (11th Cir. 2000).

Most cases prosecuted under the multiple voting statute have involved defendants who physically marked ballots outside the presence of the voters in whose names they were cast -- in other words, without the voters' participation or knowledge. The statute may also be applied successfully to schemes where the voters are present but do not participate in any way, or otherwise consent to the defendant's assistance, in the voting process.

¹⁴ False statements involving any fact which is material to registering or voting under state law may also be prosecuted under 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10, as will be discussed below.

However, when the scheme involves "assisting" voters who both are present and marginally participate in the process, such as by signing a ballot document, prosecuting the case under section 1973i(e) may present difficulties. For instance, in United States v. Salisbury, 983 F.2d 1369 (6th Cir. 1993), the defendant got voters to sign their absentee ballot forms and then instructed them how to mark their ballots, generally without allowing them to choose the candidates -- and in some cases even to know the identity of the candidates on the ballot. In a few cases the defendant also personally marked others' ballots. The Sixth Circuit held that the concept "votes more than once" in section 1973i(e) was unconstitutionally vague as applied to these facts. Because the phrase "votes more than once" was not defined in the statute, the court found the phrase did not clearly apply when the defendant did not physically mark another's ballot. The court further held that even if the defendant did mark another's ballot, it wasn't clear this was an act of "voting" by the defendant if the defendant got the ostensible voters to demonstrate "consent" by signing their names to the accompanying ballot forms. Salisbury at 1379.¹⁵

A year after Salisbury, the Seventh Circuit took a different approach -- with the benefit of more detailed jury instructions. United States v. Cole, 41 F.3d 303 (7th Cir. 1994).¹⁶ In both cases, the defendants had marked absentee ballots of other persons after getting the voters to sign their ballot documents. The Seventh Circuit rejected the Sixth Circuit's contention that the term "vote" was unconstitutionally vague, finding that the term was broadly and adequately defined in the Voting Rights Act itself, 42 U.S.C. ' 1973L(c)(1), and that this

¹⁵ The Salisbury Court noted that in United States v. Hogue, 812 F.2d 1568 (11th Cir. 1987), the jury was instructed that illegal voting under section 1973i(e) included marking another person's ballot without his or her "express or implied consent," but found that, on the facts of Salisbury, the jury should also have been given definitions of "vote" and "consent." Salisbury at 1377.

¹⁶ After discussing the Sixth Circuit's reasoning, the Seventh Circuit expressly declined to follow it. The Cole decision was written by a judge of the Eleventh Circuit, sitting by designation. Cole thus also may have some value in the Eleventh Circuit.

statutory definition was supported by both the dictionary and commonly understood meaning of the word. The court held that the facts established a clear violation by the defendant of the multiple voting prohibition in section 1973i(c).¹⁷

In addition to their conflicting holdings, the Salisbury and Cole opinions differ in their approach to so-called voter "assistance" cases. Salisbury focused on the issue of voter consent -- that is, whether the voters had, by their conduct, in some way "consented" to having the defendant mark, or help them mark, their own ballots. Cole, on the other hand, focused on whether it was the voter or the defendant who actually expressed candidate preferences.

In a more recent case, the Eleventh Circuit followed the rationale in Cole with respect to a scheme to obtain and cast ballots for indigent voters without their knowledge or consent. Smith, supra. The court even went so far as to note that, in its view, a section 1973i(e) offense could lie regardless of whether the voter had consented to another's marking his ballot. Smith at 816, fn. 20.

While the approach taken in Cole and Smith is, from a prosecutor's perspective, preferable to Salisbury's, the latter's discussion of the issue of possible voter "consent" remains important, since facts suggesting the possibility of consent may weaken the evidence of fraud. Taken together, these three cases suggest the following approach to voter "assistance" frauds:

- The use of section 1973i(e) should generally be confined to what amounts to clear "ballot theft." Examples of such situations are where the defendant marked the ballots of others without their input; where voters did not knowingly consent to the defendant's participation in their voting transactions; where the voters' electoral preferences were disregarded; or where the defendant marked the ballots of voters who lacked the mental capacity to vote or to consent to the defendant's activities.
- Jury instructions for a section 1973i(e) indictment should amplify the key term "votes more than once" in the context of the particular case, and specifically define the terms "vote," and, where appropriate, "consent" and "implied consent." See 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(c)(1) (containing an extremely broad definition of "vote") and United States v. Boards, 10 F.3d 587, 589 (8th Cir. 1993) (holding that this definition encompasses applying for an absentee ballot).

Thus, while the clearest use of section 1973i(e) is to prosecute pure ballot forgery schemes, the statute can also apply to other types of schemes where voters are manipulated, misled, or otherwise deprived of their votes. See Cole at 310-311 (witness believed the defendant was merely registering her to vote, not helping her vote). Schemes to steal the votes of the elderly, infirm, or economically disadvantaged may constitute multiple voting if there is a clear absence of meaningful voter participation. Because of their vulnerability, these persons are frequent targets of ballot schemes, and often do not even know that their ballots have been stolen or their voting choices ignored; furthermore, if they have been intimidated, they are generally reluctant to say so.

There is a significant evidentiary difference between voter intimidation and multiple voting that suggests that the multiple voting statute may often become the preferred charging statute for voter "assistance" frauds. Voter intimidation requires proof of a difficult element: the existence of physical or economic intimidation that is intended by the defendant and felt by the victim. In contrast, the key element in a multiple voting offense is whether the defendant voted the ballot of another person without consulting with that person or taking into account his or her electoral preferences.

In conclusion, if the facts show manipulation of what the United States Sentencing Guidelines call "vulnerable victims" for the purpose of obtaining control over the victims' ballot choices, the use of section 1973i(e) as a prosecutive theory should always be considered.

5. Voter intimidation

Voter intimidation schemes are the functional opposite of voter bribery schemes. In the case of voter bribery, voting activity is stimulated by offering or giving something of value to individuals to induce them to vote or reward them for having voted. The goal of voter intimidation, on the other hand, is to deter or influence voting activity through threats to deprive voters of something they already have, such as jobs, government benefits, or, in extreme cases, their personal safety. Another distinction between voter bribery and intimidation is that bribery generates concrete evidence: the bribe itself (generally money). Intimidation, on the other hand, is amorphous and largely subjective in nature, and lacks such concrete evidence.

Voter intimidation is an assault against both the individual and society, warranting prompt and effective redress by the criminal justice system. Yet a number of factors make it difficult to prosecute. The intimidation is likely to be both subtle and without witnesses. Furthermore, voters who have been intimidated are not merely victims; it is their testimony that proves the crime. These voters must testify, publicly and in an adversarial proceeding, against the very person who intimidated them. Obtaining this crucial testimony can be difficult.

The crime of voter "intimidation" normally requires evidence of threats, duress, economic coercion, or some other aggravating factor which tends to improperly induce conduct on the part of the victim. If such evidence is lacking, an alternative prosecutive theory may apply to the facts, such as multiple voting in violation of 42 U.S.C. ' 1973i(e). Indeed, in certain cases the concepts of "intimidation" and voting "more than once" may overlap and even merge. For example, a scheme which targets the votes of persons who are mentally handicapped, economically depressed, or socially vulnerable may involve elements of both crimes. Because of their vulnerability, these persons are often easily manipulated -- without the need for inducements, threats, or duress. In such cases, the use of section 1973i(e) as a prosecutive theory should be considered. See United States v. Odom, 736 F.2d 104 (4th Cir. 1984).

The main federal criminal statutes that can apply to voter intimidation are: 18 U.S.C. " 241, 242, 245(b)(1)(A), 594, and two statutes enacted in 1993, 18 U.S.C. ' 610 and 42 U.S.C. ' 1973gg-10(1). Each of these statutes is discussed below.

a) Intimidation in voting and registering to vote: 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10(1)

Congress enacted the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA), 42 U.S.C. " 1973gg-1973gg-10, in 1993. The principal purpose of this legislation was to require that the states provide prospective voters with uniform and convenient means by which to register for the federal franchise. In response to concerns that relaxing registration requirements might lead to an increase in election fraud, the NVRA also included a new series of election crimes, one of which prohibited knowingly and willfully intimidating or coercing prospective voters for registering to vote, or for voting, in any election for federal office. 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10(1). Violators are subject to imprisonment for up to five years.

As with other statutes addressing voter intimidation, in the absence of any jurisprudence to the contrary, it is the Criminal Division's position that section 1973gg-10(1) applies only to intimidation which is accomplished through the use of threats of physical or economic duress. Voter "intimidation" accomplished through less drastic means may present violations of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(b), which are enforced by the Civil Rights Division through noncriminal remedies.

The jurisdictional element for section 1973gg-10(1) is "in any election for Federal office." This is slightly different phraseology than that used in sections 1973i(c) and i(e), discussed above. In matters involving intimidation in connection with voter registration, this jurisdictional element is satisfied in every case because voter registration is unitary in all 50 states: i.e., one registers to vote only once to become eligible to vote for federal as well as non-federal candidates. However, when the intimidation occurs in connection with voting, the jurisdictional situation may not be as clear. Although at the time this book was written there had been no jurisprudence on the issue, the Criminal Division believes that in voting intimidation matters, federal prosecutors should exercise caution by ensuring that the vote corrupted by the intimidation included marking the victim's ballot for a federal candidate. Unlike sections 1973i(c) and i(e), the mere presence of a federal candidate's name on the ballot may not be sufficient to satisfy the jurisdictional predicate of this statute.

b) Intimidation of voters: 18 U.S.C. § 594

Section 594 prohibits intimidating, threatening, or coercing anyone, or attempting to do so, for the purpose of interfering with an individual's right to vote or not vote in any election held in whole or in part to elect a federal candidate. The statute does not apply to primaries. Violations are one-year misdemeanors.

The operative words in section 594 are "intimidates," "threatens," and "coerces." The scienter element requires proof that the actor intended to force voters to act against their will by placing them in fear of losing something of value. The feared loss may be of something tangible, such as money or economic benefits, or intangible, such as liberty or safety.

Section 594 was enacted as part of the original 1939 Hatch Act, which aimed at prohibiting the blatant economic coercion used during the 1930s to force federal employees and recipients of federal relief benefits to perform political work and to vote for and contribute to the candidates supported by their supervisors. The congressional debates on the Hatch Act show that Congress intended section 594 to apply where persons were placed in fear of losing something of value for the purpose of extracting involuntary political activities. 84 Cong. Rec. 9596-611 (1939). Although the impetus for the passage of section 594 was Congress's concern over the use of threats of economic loss to induce political activity, the statute also applies to conduct which interferes, or attempts to interfere, with an individual's right to vote by placing him or her in fear of suffering other kinds of tangible and intangible losses. It thus criminalizes conduct intended to force prospective voters to vote against their preferences, or refrain from voting, through activity reasonably calculated to instill some form of fear in them.¹⁸

¹⁸ In recent years, the civil counterparts to section 594, 42 U.S.C. §§ 1971b and 1973(b), have been used to combat nonviolent voter intimidation. See, e.g., United States v. North Carolina Republican, No. 91-161-Civ-5F (E.D.N.C., consent decree entered Feb. 27, 1992) (consent order entered against political organizations for mailing to thousands of minority voters postcards that contained false voting information and a threat of prosecution).

c) Coercion of political activity: 18 U.S.C. § 610

Section 610 was enacted as part of the 1993 Hatch Act Reform Amendments to provide increased protection against political manipulation of federal employees in the executive branch.¹⁹ It prohibits intimidating or coercing a federal employee to induce or discourage "any political activity" by the employee. Violators are subject to imprisonment for up to three years. This statute is discussed in detail in Chapter Two, which addresses patronage crimes.

Although the class of persons covered by section 610 is limited to federal employees, the conduct covered by this new statute is broad: it reaches political activity which relates to any public office or election, whether federal, state, or local. The phrase "political activity" in section 610 expressly includes, but is not limited to, "voting or refusing to vote for any candidate or measure," "making or refusing to make any political contribution," and "working or refusing to work on behalf of any candidate."

d) Conspiracy against rights and deprivation of constitutional rights:
18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242

Section 241 makes it a ten-year felony to "conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any person in any state, territory or district in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States" -- including the right to vote. The statute, which is discussed in detail above, has potential application to two forms of voter intimidation: a conspiracy to prevent persons whom the subjects knew were qualified voters from entering the polls to vote in an election where a federal candidate is on the ballot, and a conspiracy to misuse state authority to prevent qualified voters from voting for any candidate in any election.

Section 241 has been successfully used to prosecute intimidation in connection with political activities. Wilkins v. United States, 376 F.2d 552 (5th Cir.)(en banc), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 964 (1967). Wilkins involved both violence and clear racial animus. It arose out of the shooting of a participant in the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march. The marchers had intended to present to the Governor of Alabama a petition for redress of grievances, including denial of their right to vote. The Fifth Circuit held that those marching to protest denial of their voting rights were exercising "an attribute of national citizenship, guaranteed by the United States," and that shooting one of the marchers therefore violated section 241. 376 F.2d at 561.

Section 242, as also discussed above, makes it a misdemeanor for any person to act "under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom," knowingly and willfully to deprive any person in a state, territory, or district of a right guaranteed by the Constitution or federal law. For all practical purposes, this statute embodies the substantive offense for a section 241 conspiracy and it therefore can apply to voter intimidation.

It is the Criminal Division's position that sections 241 and 242 may be used to prosecute schemes the object of which was to intimidate voters in federal elections through threats of physical or economic duress, or to prevent otherwise lawfully qualified voters from getting to the polls in elections where federal candidates are on the ballot. Examples of the latter include intentionally jamming telephone lines to disrupt a political party's get-out-the-vote or "ride-to-the-polls" efforts, and schemes to vandalize motor vehicles a political faction or party intended to use to get voters to the polls.

e) Federally protected activities: 18 U.S.C. § 245(b)(1)(A)

The Civil Rights Act of 1968 contains a broad provision that addresses violence intended to intimidate voting in any election in this country. 18 U.S.C. ' 245(b)(1)(A). This provision applies without regard to the presence of racial or ethnic factors.

Section 245(b)(1)(A) makes it illegal to use or threaten to use physical force to intimidate individuals from, among other things, "voting or qualifying to vote." It reaches threats to use physical force against a victim because the victim has exercised his or her franchise, or to prevent the victim from doing so. Violations are misdemeanors if no bodily injury results, and ten-year felonies if it does; if death results, the penalty is life imprisonment.

Prosecutions under section 245 require written authorization by the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, the Associate Attorney General, or a specifically designated Assistant Attorney General, who must certify that federal prosecution of the matter is "in the public interest and necessary to secure substantial justice." § 245(a)(1). This approval requirement was imposed in response to federalism issues which many Members of Congress believed were inherent in a statute giving the federal government prosecutive jurisdiction over what otherwise would be mere assault and battery cases. See 1968 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1837-67 (Judiciary Committee Report on H.R. 2516). In making the required certification under section 245(b)(1)(A), the standard to be applied by the Attorney General is whether the facts of the particular matter are such that the appropriate state law enforcement authorities should, but either cannot or will not, effectively enforce the applicable state law, thereby creating an overriding need for federal intervention. 1968 U.S.C.C.A.N 1845-48 (Judiciary Committee Report on H.R. 2516).

6. Fraudulent registering and voting: 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10(2)

This provision was enacted as part of the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 (NVRA). As discussed above, Congress enacted the NVRA to ease voter registration requirements throughout the country. The major goal of this legislation was to promote the exercise of the franchise by replacing diverse state voter registration requirements with uniform and more convenient registration options, such as registration by mail, when applying for a driver's license, and at various government agencies.

In addition, the NVRA sought to protect the integrity of the electoral process and the accuracy of the country's voter registration rolls. To further this goal, a new criminal statute was enacted which specifically addressed two common forms of electoral corruption: intimidation of voters (42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-10(1), discussed above), and fraudulent registration and voting. 42 U.S.C. ' 1973gg-10(2). Violations of this statute are punishable by imprisonment for up to five years.

The NVRA's criminal statute resulted from law enforcement concerns expressed during congressional debates on the proposed law. Opponents and supporters of the NVRA alike recognized that relaxing requirements for registering to vote had the unavoidable potential to increase the occurrence of election crime by making it easier for the unscrupulous to pack registration rolls with fraudulent applications and ballots.

The constitutional basis of the NVRA is Congress's broad power to regulate the election of federal officials. NVRA's criminal provision reflects this federal focus, and is limited to conduct which occurs "in any election to Federal office." The phrasing of this jurisdictional element differs somewhat from the jurisdictional language used by Congress in earlier election fraud statutes, which required only that the name of a federal candidate be on the ballot.²⁰ While the Department believes that the jurisdictional language used in section 1973gg-10 was included to achieve the same result as the jurisdictional element for sections 1973i(c) and i(e), prosecutors and investigators wishing to proceed under section 1973gg-10 should be sensitive to the differences in its jurisdictional phraseology and when proceeding under section 1973gg-10 should be prepared to prove that the fraud in question either pertained to voter registration or that it affected, at least indirectly, the vote count for the federal candidate(s) on the ballot.

a) Fraudulent registration: § 1973gg-10(2)(A)

Subsection 1973gg-10(2)(A) prohibits any person, in an election for federal office, from defrauding or attempting to defraud the residents of a state of a fair and impartially conducted election by procuring or submitting voter registration applications that the offender knows are materially false or defective under state law. The scope of the statute is broader than that of the "false information" provision of section 1973i(c), discussed above, which is limited to false information involving only name, address, or period of residence. The statute applies to any false information that is material to a registration decision by an election official. For this reason, the provision is likely to be the statute of preference for most false registration matters.

For schemes to submit fraudulent registration applications, the statute's "federal office" jurisdictional element is automatically satisfied and hence does not present a problem. This is because registration to vote is unitary in all states, in the sense that in registering to vote an individual becomes eligible to vote in all elections, nonfederal as well as federal.

b) Fraudulent voting: § 1973gg-10(2)(B)

Subsection 1973gg-10(2)(B) prohibits any person, in an election for federal office, from defrauding or attempting to defraud the residents of a state of a fair election through casting or tabulating ballots that the offender knows are materially false or fraudulent under state law. Unlike other ballot fraud laws discussed in this chapter, the focus of this provision is not on any single type of fraud, but rather on the result of the false information: that is, whether the ballot generated through the false information was defective and void under state law. Because of the conceptual breadth of the new provision, it may become a useful alternative to general fraud statutes in reaching certain forms of election corruption.

The statute's jurisdictional element, "in any election for Federal office," restricts its usefulness for fraudulent voting (as opposed to fraudulent registration) schemes. This subsection of the statute applies only to elections which include a federal candidate. Thus its scope is similar to that of 42 U.S.C. " 1973i(c) and (e), and arises from the fact that fraudulent activity aimed at any race in a mixed election has the potential to taint the integrity of the federal race.

7. Voting by noncitizens

Federal law does not expressly require that persons be United States citizens in order to vote. Eligibility to vote is a matter which the Constitution leaves primarily to the states. At the time this book was written, all states required that prospective voters be United States citizens.

In 1993, the federal role in the election process expanded substantially with the passage of the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA). This legislation required, among other things, that forms used to register voters clearly state that citizenship is a voting prerequisite, and that persons registering to vote in federal elections affirm that they are United States citizens. 42 U.S.C. §§ 1973gg-3(c)(2)(c), 1973gg-5(a)(6)(A)(I), 1973gg-7(b)(2). Nine years later, this requirement was reemphasized with respect to individuals who register to vote by mail. The Help America Vote Act of 2002 required the states to place a citizenship question on forms used by individuals under the "registration by mail" feature of NVRA. 42 U.S.C. § 15483(b)(4)(A).

Voting by noncitizens is covered by four separate federal criminal laws:

a) Fraudulent registration and voting under the NVRA: 42 U.S.C. 1973gg-10

The NVRA enacted a new criminal statute that reaches the knowing and willful submission to election authorities of false information which is material under state law. 42 U.S.C. ' 1973gg-10(2). Because all states make citizenship a prerequisite for voting, statements by prospective voters concerning citizenship status are automatically "material" within the meaning of this statute.

Therefore, any false statement concerning an applicant's citizenship status that is made on a registration form submitted to election authorities can involve a violation of the NVRA's registration fraud statute. Such violations are felonies subject to imprisonment for up to five years.

For jurisdictional purposes, the statute requires that the fraud be in connection with a federal election. As discussed above, voter registration in every state is unitary, in the sense that an individual registers to vote only once for all elective offices, local, state, and federal. Thus the jurisdictional element of section 1973gg-10(2) is satisfied whenever a false statement concerning citizenship status is made on a voter registration form.

Section 1973gg-10(2) is a specific intent offense. This means that the offender must have been aware that citizenship is a requirement for voting and that the registrant did not possess United States citizenship. In most instances, proof of the first element is relatively easy because the citizenship requirement is stated on the voter registration form, and the form requires that the voter check a box indicating that he or she is a citizen. Proof of the second element, however, may be more problematic, since the technicalities of acquiring United States citizenship may not have existed in the culture of the registrant's country of birth, or otherwise been evident to him, and because the registrant may have received bad advice concerning the citizenship requirement. These issues can also usually be overcome by the fact that all voter registration forms now require a registrant to certify that he or she is a citizen.

b) Naturalization, citizenship, or alien registry:
18 U.S.C. § 1015(f)

Section 1015(f) was enacted in 1996 to provide an additional criminal prohibition addressing the participation of noncitizens in the voting process. This statute makes it an offense for an individual to make any false statement or claim that he or she is a citizen of the United States in order to register, or to vote. Unlike all other statutes addressing alien voting, section 1015(f) expressly applies to all elections -- federal, state, and local -- as well as to initiatives, recalls, and referenda.

Jurisdictionally, section 1015(f) rests on Congress's power over nationality (art. I, § 8, cl. 3), rather than on the Election Clause (art. I, § 4, cl. 1), which provides the basis for its broad reach.

Section 1015(f) is a specific intent offense and requires proof that the registrant or voter, or the person assisting the registrant or voter, be aware that citizenship is a prerequisite for registering or voting and that the registrant or voter does not possess United States citizenship.

Violations of section 1015(f) are felonies, punishable by imprisonment for up to five years.

c) Citizen of the United States: 18 U.S.C. § 911

Section 911 prohibits the knowing and willful false assertion of United States citizenship by a noncitizen. See, e.g., United States v. Franklin, 188 F.2d 182 (7th Cir. 1951); Fotie v. United States, 137 F.2d 831 (8th Cir. 1943). Violations of section 911 are punishable by imprisonment for up to three years.

As noted, all states require United States citizenship as a prerequisite for voting. However, historically, some states have not implemented the prerequisite through voter registration forms that clearly alerted prospective registrants that only citizens may vote. Under the NVRA, all states must now make this citizenship requirement clear, and prospective registrants must sign applications under penalty of perjury attesting that they meet this requirement. Therefore, falsely attesting to citizenship in any state is now more likely to be demonstrably willful, and therefore cognizable under section 911.

Section 911 requires proof that the offender was aware he was not a United States citizen, and that he was falsely claiming to be a citizen on a voter registration form. Violations of section 911 are felonies, punishable by up to three years' imprisonment.

d) Voting by aliens: 18 U.S.C. § 611

Section 611 is a relatively new statute that creates an additional crime for voting by persons who are not United States Citizens.

It applies to voting by non-citizens in an election where a federal candidate is on the ballot, except when: (1) non-citizens are authorized to vote by state or local law on non-federal candidates or issues, and (2) the ballot is formatted in a way that the non-citizen has the opportunity to vote solely for the non-federal candidate or issues on which he is entitled to vote under state law. Unlike section 1015(f), section 611 is directed at the act of voting, rather than the act of lying. But unlike section 1015(f), Section 611 is a strict liability offense in the sense that the prosecution must only prove that the defendant was not a citizen when he registered or voted.

Section 611 does not require proof that the offender be aware that citizenship is a prerequisite to voting.

Violations of section 611 are misdemeanors, punishable by up to one year imprisonment.

8. Travel Act: 18 U.S.C. § 1952

The Travel Act, 18 U.S.C. ' 1952, prohibits interstate travel, the interstate use of any other facility (such as a telephone), and any use of the mails to further specified "unlawful activity," including bribery in violation of state or federal law. Violations are punishable by imprisonment for up to five years. This statute is useful in election crime matters in that it applies to vote buying offenses that occur in states where vote-buying is a "bribery" offense, and it does so regardless of the type of election involved.

The predicate bribery under state law need not be common law bribery. The Travel Act applies as long as the conduct is classified as a "bribery" offense under applicable state law. Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37 (1979). In addition, the Travel Act has been held to incorporate state crimes regardless of whether they are classified as felonies or misdemeanors. United States v. Polizzi, 500 F.2d 856, 873 (9th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1120 (1975), United States v. Karigiannis, 430 F.2d 148, 150 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 904 (1970).

The first task in determining whether the Travel Act has potential application to a vote buying scheme is to examine the law of the state where the vote buying occurred to determine if it either: (1) is classified as a bribery offense, or (2) describes the offense of paying voters for voting in a way that requires proof of a quid pro quo, i.e., that a voter be paid in consideration for his or her vote for one or more candidates. If the state offense meets either of these criteria, the Travel Act potentially applies.

In the past, Travel Act prosecutions have customarily rested on predicate acts of interstate travel or the use of interstate facilities. Since election fraud is a local crime, interstate predicate acts are rarely present, and the Travel Act has not been used to prosecute election crime. However, in United States v. Riccardelli, 794 F.2d 829 (2d Cir. 1986), the Act's mail predicate was held to be satisfied by proof of an intrastate mailing. In reaching this conclusion, the Court conducted an exhaustive analysis of the Travel Act's legislative history and Congress's authority to regulate the mails. The Sixth Circuit subsequently reached a contrary result, holding that the Travel Act's mail predicate required an interstate mailing. United States v. Barry, 888 F.2d 1092 (6th Cir. 1989). In 1990 Congress resolved this conflict by adopting the Riccardelli holding in an amendment to the Travel Act, expressly extending federal jurisdiction to any use of the mails in furtherance of a state predicate offense.

Thus, the Travel Act should be considered as a vehicle to prosecute vote buying schemes in which the mails were used in those states where vote buying is statutorily defined as bribery. This theory is one of the few available which do not require a federal candidate on the ballot.

As with the mail fraud statute, each use of the mails in the furtherance of the bribery scheme is a separate offense. United States v. Jabara, 644 F.2d 574 (6th Cir. 1981). The defendant need not actually have done the mailing, so long as it was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of his or her activities. United States v. Kelly, 395 F.2d 727 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 963 (1968). Nor need the mailing have in itself constituted the illegal activity, as long as it promoted it in some way. United States v. Bagnariol, 665 F.2d 877 (9th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 962 (1982); United States v. Barbieri, 614 F.2d 715 (10th Cir. 1980); United States v. Peskin, 527 F.2d 71 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 818 (1976); United States v. Wechsler, 392 F.2d 344 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 392 U.S. 932 (1968).

An unusual feature of the Travel Act is that it requires an overt act subsequent to the jurisdictional event charged in the indictment. Thus, if a Travel Act charge is predicated on a use of the mails, the government must allege and prove that the defendant or his or her agent subsequently acted to further the underlying unlawful activity. The subsequent overt act need not be unlawful in itself; this element has been generally held to be satisfied by the commission of a legal act as long as the act facilitated the unlawful activity. See, e.g., United States v. Davis, 780 F.2d 838 (10th Cir. 1985).

The Travel Act is particularly useful in voter bribery cases in non-federal elections that involve the mailing of absentee ballot materials. Such matters usually involve a defendant who offers voters compensation for voting, followed by the voter applying for, obtaining, and ultimately casting an absentee ballot. Each voting transaction can involve as many as four separate mailings: when the absentee ballot application is sent to the voter, when the completed application is sent to the local election board, when the absentee ballot is sent to the voter, and when the voter sends the completed ballot back to the election authority for tabulation.

The mailing must be in furtherance of the scheme. Therefore, care should be taken to ensure that the voting transaction in question was corrupted by a bribe before the mailing charged. If, for example, the voter was not led to believe that he or she would be paid for voting until after applying for, and receiving, an absentee ballot package, then the only mailing affected by bribery would be the transmission of the ballot package to the election authority; the Travel Act charge would have to be predicated on this final mailing, with some other subsequent overt act charged.

9. Mail and Wire Fraud: 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341 and 1343

The federal mail fraud statute prohibits use of the United States mails, or a private or commercial interstate carrier, to further a "scheme or artifice to defraud." 18 U.S.C. § 1341.21 Violations are punishable by imprisonment for up to five years.

At present, the most viable means of addressing election crime under the mail fraud statute is the "salary theory." Under this approach, the pecuniary benefits of elective office are charged as the object of the scheme.

a) Background

Until McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350 (1987), the mail fraud statute was frequently and successfully used to attain federal jurisdiction over schemes to corrupt local elections. Because its jurisdictional basis is the broad power of Congress to regulate the mails, section 1341 was used to address corruption of the voting process in purely local or state elections. See Badders v. United States, 240 U.S. 391, 392 (1916) (overt act of putting a letter in a United States post office is a matter Congress may regulate).

Courts had broadly interpreted the "scheme to defraud" element of section 1341 to include nearly any effort to procure, cast, or tabulate ballots illegal under state law. The theory was that citizens were entitled to fair and honest elections, and a scheme to corrupt an election defrauded them of this right. United States v. Girdner, 754 F.2d 877, 880 (10th Cir. 1985) (scheme to cast votes for ineligible voters); United States v. Clapps, 732 F.2d 1148, 1152-53 (3d Cir.) (scheme to usurp absentee ballots of elderly voters), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1085 (1984); United States v. States, 488 F.2d 761, 766 (8th Cir. 1973) (scheme to submit fraudulent absentee ballots), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 909 (1974). The mail fraud statute was even held to reach schemes to deprive the public of information required under state campaign finance disclosure statutes. United States v. Buckley, 689 F.2d 893, 897-98 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1086 (1983); United States v. Curry, 681 F.2d 406, 411 (5th Cir. 1982).

The jurisdictional mailing requirement of section 1341, moreover, usually posed no substantial obstacle in election fraud cases. The Second Circuit may have adopted the most expansive position, holding in an unpublished opinion that the mail fraud statute applied to any fraudulent election practice resulting in postal delivery of a certificate of election to the winning candidate. See Ingber v. Enzor, 664 F. Supp. 814, 815-16 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) (habeas opinion quoting Second Circuit's opinion on direct appeal), aff'd on other grounds, 841 F.2d 450 (2d Cir. 1988). See also United States v. Gordon, 817 F.2d 1538(11th Cir. 1987)(mailing the certificate of election to the winning candidate held to be in the furtherance of an election fraud scheme to elect that candidate). As most states mail such notices to victorious candidates, this theory would have allowed federal jurisdiction over election fraud by victorious politicians, both federal and nonfederal.

However, in McNally, the Supreme Court substantially restricted the utility of the mail fraud statute to combat election crimes. McNally held that "scheme to defraud" does not encompass schemes to deprive the public of intangible rights, such as the rights to good government and fair elections, but is limited to schemes to deprive others of property rights.

In 1988, Congress enacted the so-called "McNally-fix" statute, 18 U.S.C. ' 1346, the purpose of which was to restore the pre-McNally scope of the mail fraud statute. Unfortunately, by its express terms, section 1346 only applies to schemes to deprive another of the "intangible right of honest services," a concept that does not embrace a scheme to defraud the public of a fair election or information required to be disclosed under federal or state campaign financing laws.

Nevertheless, McNally does not entirely foreclose use of the mail fraud statute to address election fraud. If a pecuniary interest -- such as money or salary -- is sought through the scheme, the mail fraud statute still applies. See McNally, 483 U.S. at 360 (noting that the jury was not charged on a money or property theory).

b) Salary theory of Mail and Wire Fraud

Schemes to obtain salaried positions by falsely representing one's credentials to a hiring authority remain prosecutable under the mail fraud statute after McNally. The objective of such "salary schemes" is to obtain pecuniary things by fraud; such schemes are therefore clearly within the scope of the common law concepts of fraud to which McNally sought to restrict the mail fraud statute. See United States v. Granberry, 908 F.2d 278, 280 (8th Cir. 1990)(scheme to obtain employment by falsifying application cognizable under salary theory); cert. denied, 500 U.S. 921 (1991); United States v. Doherty, 867 F.2d 47, 54-57 (1st Cir. 1989)(scheme to rig police promotion exam cognizable on salary theory); United States v. Walters, 711 F. Supp. 1435, 1442-46 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (scheme to obtain scholarships through false information), rev'd on other grounds, 913 F.2d 388 (7th Cir. 1990); United States v. Ferrara, 701 F. Supp. 39 (E.D.N.Y.)(scheme to obtain hospital salaries by falsifying medical training), aff'd, 868 F.2d 1268 (2d Cir. 1988); United States v. Thomas, 686 F. Supp. 1078, 1083-85 (M.D. Pa.) (scheme to rig police entrance exam), aff'd, 866 F.2d 1414 (3d Cir. 1988)(table), cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1048 (1989); United States v. Cooper, 677 F. Supp. 778, 781-82 (D. Del. 1988)(wire fraud scheme to obtain pay for person not performing work).²²

This theory of post-McNally mail fraud has potential application to some election fraud schemes, since most elected offices in the United States carry with them a salary and various emoluments that have monetary value. The criterion by which candidates for elected positions are selected by the public is who obtained the most valid votes. Thus, schemes to obtain salaried elected positions through procuring and tabulating invalid ballots are capable of being charged as traditional common law frauds: that is, schemes to obtain the salary of the office in question by concealing material facts about the critical issue of which candidate received the most valid votes. In addition, election fraud schemes can present related issues concerning the quality and value of the public officer hired thereby. The Supreme Court observed in McNally that deceit concerning the quality and value of a commodity or service remains within the scope of the mail fraud statute:

We note that as the action comes to us, there was no charge and that the jury was not required to find that the Commonwealth itself was defrauded of any money or property. It was not charged that in the absence of the alleged scheme the Commonwealth would have paid a lower premium or secured better insurance.

483 U.S. at 360 (emphasis added). Election fraud schemes involve an aspect of material concealment insofar as the "value" of the services the public is paying for are concerned: the public "hired" the candidate it was falsely led to believe received the most valid votes, and consequently received services of lower value.

The "salary theory" of post-McNally mail fraud has been applied to election frauds in only a few cases to date, most notably Ingber v. Enzor, 841 F.2d 450 (2d Cir. 1988) (post-McNally habeas relief appropriate for pre-McNally mail fraud defendant convicted of securing election to salaried township position through illegal ballots, where reviewing court could not determine whether jury's verdict rested on "salary theory" or on alternative intangible rights theory of the case); and United States v. Webb, 689 F. Supp. 703 (W.D. Ky. 1988) (tax dollars paid to a public official elected by fraud are a loss to the citizens, who did not receive the benefit of the bargain). This theory of mail fraud therefore remains a viable option by which prosecutors can attain federal jurisdiction over frauds that occur in nonfederal elections which employ the mails.

In United States v. Schermerhorn, 713 F. Supp. 88 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd, 906 F.2d 66 (2d Cir. 1990), the salary theory of mail fraud was held to apply to a scheme to violate state campaign financing laws. The facts of the case were egregious: a candidate for the State Senate whose campaign was largely funded by organized crime and who failed to disclose that fact on state campaign financing disclosure forms that were required to be filed by state law. The district judge held that such a concealment resulted in the electorate being misled, and the candidate was thereby able to obtain the office he sought and its salary from a deceived electorate. This district court decision has been advanced as authority for the proposition that violations of state campaign financing laws by candidates seeking state or local office can be federalized and prosecuted under the 18 U.S.C. § 1341. This theory has some support in the Schermerhorn case. However, prosecutors should be cautious in applying this theory and consider using it only when the facts that are not disclosed under state or local campaign financing laws would have had a clear and direct impact on voting behavior had the truth been properly reported.

c) "Honest services" frauds: 18 U.S.C. § 1346

As summarized above, prior to McNally nearly all of the Circuits had held that a scheme to defraud the public of a fair and impartial election was one of the "intangible rights" schemes to defraud that was reached by the mail and wire fraud statutes. McNally repudiated this theory in an opinion that not only rejected the intangible rights theory of mail and wire fraud, but did so by citing several election fraud cases as examples of the kinds of fraud the Court found outside these criminal laws.

The following year, Congress enacted 18 U.S.C. § 1346 for the express purpose of legislatively reversing McNally in order to restore sections 1341 and 1343 to the status they enjoyed prior to that decision. However, the language Congress used to achieve this objective did not clearly restore the use of these statutes to election frauds. This is because section 1346 is limited to schemes to deprive a victim of the "intangible right to honest services," and election frauds do not appear to involve such an objective. Moreover, jurisprudence in the arena of public corruption has generally confined section 1346 to schemes involving traditional forms of corruption that involve a clear breach of a fiduciary duty of "honest services" owed by a public official to the body politic: e.g., bribery, extortion, embezzlement, theft, conflicts of interest, and, in some instances, gratuities. See, e.g.,

United States v. Panarella, 277 F.3d 678 (3d Cir. 2002); United States v. Sawyer, 329 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 2001); United States v. Bloom, 149 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 1998); United States v. Brumley, 116 F.3d 728 (5th Cir. 1997)(en banc).

Thus, section 1346 did not restore mail and wire fraud jurisdiction to schemes to "defraud the public of a fair and impartial election," and it is the Criminal Division's position that section 1346 does not apply to schemes to corrupt elections

d) "Cost-of-election" theory of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341 and 1343

One case, United States v. DeFries, 43 F.3d 707 (D.C. Cir. 1995), held that a scheme to cast invalid ballots in a labor union election which had the effect of tainting the election to a point that exposed it to being declared invalid involved, among other things, a scheme to defraud the election authority charged with running the election of the costs involved.

DeFries was not a traditional election fraud prosecution. Rather, it involved corruption of a union election where supporters for one candidate for union office cast fraudulent ballots for the candidate they supported. When the scheme was uncovered, the United States Department of Labor ordered that a new election be held, thereby causing the union to incur an actual pecuniary loss. The D.C. Circuit held that the relationship between that pecuniary loss and the voter fraud scheme was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of McNally.

This theory of prosecution has potential validity primarily where the mail and wire fraud statutes are needed to federalize voter frauds involving the counting of illegal ballots in nonfederal elections, particularly where the fraud has led to a successful election contest and the election authority has been ordered to hold a new election and thereby incur additional costs.

10. Troops at polls: 18 U.S.C. § 592

This statute makes it unlawful to station troops or "armed men" at the polls in a general or special election (but not a primary), except when necessary "to repel armed enemies of the United States." Violations are punishable by imprisonment for up to five years and disqualification from any federal office.

Section 592 prohibits the use of official authority to order armed personnel to the polls; it does not reach the troops who actually go in response to those orders. The effect of this statute is to prohibit FBI agents from conducting investigations within the polls on election day, and United States Marshals from being stationed at open polls. This is because FBI agents and Marshals must be armed while on duty.

This statute applies only to agents of the United States government. It does not prohibit state or local law enforcement agencies from sending police officers to quell disturbances at polling places, nor does it preempt state laws that require police officers to be stationed in polling places.

11. Campaign dirty tricks

Two federal statutes - - both of which are part of the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) specifically address campaign tactics and practices: 2 U.S.C. " 441d and 441h. As is the case with all other features of FECA, violations of these two statutes are subject to both civil and criminal penalties, 2 U.S.C. §§ 437g(a) and (d) respectively. These penalties will be discussed in Chapter Six.

Section 441d provides that whenever a person or political committee makes certain types of election-related disbursements, an expenditure for the purpose of financing a public communication advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified federal candidate, or a solicitation for the purpose of influencing the election of a federal candidate, the communication must contain an attribution clause identifying the candidate, committee, or person who authorized and/or paid for the communication. The content of the attribution, as well as its size and location in the advertisement are described in the statute.

Section 441h prohibits fraudulently representing one's authority to speak for a federal candidate. As a result of the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act, the provision contains two specific prohibitions:

- a) Section 441h(a) forbids a federal candidate or an agent of a federal candidate from misrepresenting his or her authority to speak, write, or otherwise act for any other federal candidate or political party on a matter which is damaging to that other candidate or political party. For example, section 441h(a) would prohibit an agent of federal candidate A from issuing a statement that was purportedly written by federal candidate B and which concerned a matter which was damaging to candidate B.
- b) Section 441h(b) forbids any person from fraudulently representing his or her authority to solicit contributions on behalf of a federal candidate. This provision was added by BCRA and became effective on November 6, 2002. For example, this provision would prohibit any person from raising money by claiming that he or she represented federal candidate A when in fact the person had no such authority.

12. Retention of federal election records: 42 U.S.C. § 1974

The detection, investigation, and proof of election crimes --and in many instances Voting Rights Act violations - often depends on documentation generated during the voter registration, voting, tabulation, and election certification processes. In recognition of this fact, and the length of time it can take for credible election fraud predication to develop, Congress enacted Section 1974 to require that documentation generated in connection with the voting and registration process be retained for 22 months if it pertained to an election that included a federal candidate. Absent this statute, the disposition of election documentation would be subject solely to state law, which in virtually all states permits its destruction within a few months after the election is certified.

Section 1974 provides for criminal misdemeanor penalties for any election administrator who knowingly and willfully fails to retain, or willfully steals, destroys, or conceals, records covered by the statute. 42 U.S.C. § 1974a.23 More importantly, the reach of this statute qualitatively to specific categories of election documentation is critical to prosecutors as well as election administrators, who must often resolve election disputes and answer challenges to the fairness of elections.²⁴

For this reason, a detailed discussion of section 1974 and its application to particular types of election documentation generated in the current age of electronic voting will be presented here.

a) Legislative purpose and background

The voting process generates voluminous documents and records, ranging from voter registration forms and absentee ballot applications to ballots and tally reports. If election fraud occurs, these records often play an important role in the detection and prosecution of the crime. Documentation generated by the election process also plays an equally important role in the detection, investigation and proof of federal civil rights violations.

State laws generally require that voting documents be retained for sixty to ninety days. Those relatively brief periods are usually insufficient to make certain that voting records will be preserved until more subtle forms of federal civil rights abuses and election crimes have been detected.

In 1960, Congress enacted a federal requirement that extended the document retention period for elections where federal candidates were on the ballot to ~~twenty-two months~~ after the election. Pub. L. 86-449, Title III, § 301, 74 Stat. 88; 42 U.S.C. §§ 1974-1974e. This election documentation retention requirement is backed-up with criminal misdemeanor penalties that apply to election officers and document custodians who willfully destroy covered election records before the expiration of the 22-month federal retention period.

The retention requirements of section 1974 are aimed specifically at election administrators. In a parochial sense, these laws place criminally sanctionable duties on election officials. However, in a broader sense this federal retention law assists election administrators perform more efficiently the tasks of managing elections, and determining winners of elective contests. It does this by requiring election managers to focus appropriate attention on the types of election records under their supervision and control that may be needed to resolve challenges to the election process, and by requiring that they take appropriate steps to insure that those records will be preserved intact until such time as they may become needed to resolve legitimate questions that frequently arise involving the election process. In this way, section 1974 serves the election administrators by better equipping them to respond to legitimate questions concerning the voting process when they arise.

b) The basic requirements of section 1974

Section 1974 requires that election administrators preserve for twenty-two months "all records and papers which come into their possession relating to any application, registration, payment of poll tax, or other act requisite to voting." This retention requirement applies to all elections in which a candidate for federal office was on the ballot, that is, a candidate for the United States Senate, the United States House of Representatives, President or Vice President of the United States, or presidential elector. Section 1974 does not apply to records generated in connection with purely local or state elections.

Retention and disposition of records in purely nonfederal elections (those where no federal candidates were on the ballot) are governed by state document retention laws.

However, section 1974 does apply to all records generated in connection with the process of registering voters and maintaining current electoral rolls. This is because voter registration in virtually all United States jurisdictions is "unitary," in the sense that a potential voter registers only once to become eligible to vote for both local and federal candidates. See United States v. Ciancuilli, 482 F.Supp. 585 (E.D.Pa. 1979). Thus, registration records must be preserved as long as the voter registration to which they pertain is considered an "active" one under local law and practice, and those records cannot be disposed of until the expiration of 22 months following the date on which the registration ceased to be "active."

This statute must be interpreted in keeping with its congressional objective: Under section 1974, all documents and records that may be relevant to the detection or prosecution of federal civil rights or election crimes must be maintained if the documents or records were generated in connection with an election which included one or more federal candidates.

c) Section 1974 requires document preservation, not document generation

Section 1974 does not require that states or localities produce records in the course of their election processes. However, if a state or locality chooses to create a record that pertains to voting, this statute requires that documentation to be retained if it pertains to voting in an election covered by the statute.

d) Originals must be retained

Section 1974 further requires that the original documents be maintained, even in those jurisdictions that have the capability to reduce original records to digitized replicas. This is because handwriting analysis cannot at present be performed on digitized reproductions of signatures, and because the legislative purpose advanced by this statute is to preserve election records for their evidentiary value in criminal and civil rights lawsuits. Therefore, in states and localities that employ new digitization technology to archive election forms that were originally manually subscribed by voters, Section 1974 requires that the originals be maintained for the requisite 22-month period.

e) Election officials must supervise storage

Section 1974 requires that covered election documentation be retained either physically by election officials themselves, or under the direct administrative supervision of election officers. This is because the document retention requirements of this federal law place the retention and safe-keeping duties squarely on the shoulders of election officers, and Section 1974 does not contemplate that this responsibility be shifted to other government agencies or officers.

An electoral jurisdiction may validly determine that election records subject to section 1974 would most efficiently be kept under the physical supervision of government officers other than election officers (e.g., motor vehicle departments, social service administrators). This is particularly likely to occur following the enactment of the NVRA, which for the first time in many states gives government agencies other than election administrators a substantive role in the voter registration process.

If an electoral jurisdiction makes such a determination, section 1974 requires that administrative procedures be in place giving election officers ultimate management authority over the retention and security of those election records. Those administrative procedures should insure that election officers retain ultimate responsibility for the retention and security of covered election documents and records, and that election officers retain the right to physically access and dispose of them.

f) Retention not required for certain records

Section 1974 does not apply to surplus voting materials that are not used in elections where federal candidates were on the ballot. Examples of such surplus materials include unused ballots and forms, inventories of supplies, payroll and personnel records pertaining to the hiring, training or payment of election officials, and other documents that do not reflect or embody a step in the registration or the voting process. Section 1974 only requires the retention of documentation that results in, or which reflects, an act of registering to vote or voting, or a step in the vote tabulation and election certification process.

Documentation generated in the course of elections held solely for local or state candidates, or bond issues, initiatives, referenda and the like, is not covered by Section 1974 and may be disposed of within the usually shorter time periods provided under state election laws. However, if there is a federal candidate on the ballot in the election, the 22-month federal retention requirement applies.

g) Retention under Section 1974 versus retention under the National Voter Registration Act

The retention requirements of section 1974 interface significantly with somewhat similar retention requirements of the National Voter Registration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg-6(i).

There differences between these two provisions are threefold:

First, section 1974 applies to all records generated by the election process, while section 1973gg-6(i) applies only to registration records generated under the NVRA.

Second, section 1974 requires only that records subject to its terms be retained intact for the requisite 22-month period, while section 1973gg-6(i) requires that registration records be both retained and -- with certain specifically noted exceptions -- be made available to the public for inspection for 24 months.

Third, violations of section 1974 by election administrators are subject to criminal sanctions, while violations of section 1973gg-6(i) are subject only to noncriminal remedies.

E. CONCLUDING COMMENTS: WHY PROSECUTING ELECTION CRIMES IS IMPORTANT

I conclude this paper with an editorial of March 19, 2004, in the Big Sandy News of Eastern Kentucky concerning a recent series of vote buying prosecutions in a rural jurisdiction in the Appalachian Mountains of Eastern Kentucky. The editorial comments on the sentencing of the County Judge-Executive of Knott County and a campaign worker for vote buying. It appears here with the permission of the Big Sandy News, whose late Publisher and Editor, Scott Perry, as an Eastern Kentucky newspaper man, led a strong charge against public corruption and took a proactive role in the fight.

In Kentucky, county judge-executives are the chief operating officers of county government, and, as such, occupy a position of substantial power. Judge Donnie Newsome's conviction culminated a series of vote buying cases the Public Integrity Section and the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Kentucky jointly prosecuted during 2003 and early 2004 that arose out of a scheme to pay voters for voting in the 1998 primary. This series of cases ultimately resulted in the indictment of 16 defendants. Twelve of these defendants were convicted, three defendants were acquitted, and one defendant's case was dismissed. The highlight of this series of election fraud cases was the conviction of Knott County Judge-Executive Donnie Newsome for for vote buying in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1973i©. Thereafter, the defendant cooperated with the prosecution and received a sentence reduction recommendation under U.S.S.G. §5K1.1. On March 16, 2004, he was sentenced to serve 26 months in prison.²⁵

²⁵ The sentencing judge indicated that had it not been for the downward departure recommended by the prosecution, he was prepared to sentence Newsome to five years' imprisonment.

The following editorial, reprinted here in its entirety, presents an eloquent yet concise statement of why the investigation and prosecution of electoral corruption are important law enforcement priorities of the Justice Department.

Vote fraud sentencing sad, encouraging
-- by Susan Allen

Tuesday's sentencing in federal court of Knott County Judge-Executive Donnie Newsome and campaign worker Willard Smith on vote buying charges was both a sad and encouraging day for Eastern Kentucky.

Sad the people of Knott County were effectively robbed of their voting rights by Newsome and others doling out cash to buy a public office.

Sad that, as Federal Judge Danny C. Reeves pointed out, some people in Knott and other counties think that elections are supposed to be bought and the only reason to go to the polls is to get their pay off.

Sad those seeking public office in Knott County, and most assuredly in other counties, target poor, handicapped, addicted and uneducated voters to carry out their scheme to secure public office and a hefty paycheck.

Sad that voters in Knott and other counties have been reduced by years and years of political corruption to truly believing that selling their vote is not wrong, it's the norm.

Sad that Eastern Kentuckians have pretty much been left to the mercy of the political machines which serve as dictators of their lives, from their home towns all the way to Frankfort.

Sad that generations sacrificed their lives and their children's lives to the political bosses for mere bones from their local leaders while now their kids are dying from drug overdoses which, we strongly suspect, are directly tied to the years of iniquity and demoralization.

Sad that even today some elected officials continue the abuse and either refuse or can't comprehend the impact of their past and current atrocities against their own people.

Sad that Judge Reeves could see and completely understand during just a one week trial the utter hopelessness and apathy in the area people feel regarding the so-called democratic process.

Sad that our state lawmakers have piddled away their time during this legislative session on petty political issues without even proposing laws that would bar convicted felons, especially vote buyers from retaining their offices while appealing their verdicts.

Sad that Donnie Newsome continues to rule Knott County from a jail cell.

Tuesday's events were encouraging in that prosecutors (AUSA E.D. Ky.) Tom Self and (Public Integrity Section Trial Attorney) Richard Pilger were willing to fight the hard battle for the people of Knott County, which hopefully will lead to at least a grassroots effort for people to take back their towns.

Encouraging that some light has been shed on the workings of the dark political underworld which might shock the good people of Eastern Kentucky into action, at least for their children's future.

Encouraging that what might be perceived as a baby step with Newsome's conviction could finally lead to that giant step Eastern Kentuckians must surely be ready to take to recapture control of their own destinies.

Encouraging that federal authorities have pledged to continue the fight they have started to restore to the people the right to govern themselves without dealing with a stacked deck.

Encouraging that Judge Reeves and prosecutors did see that the Knott Countians who sold their votes, in some cases for food, were victims of Newsome's plot and didn't need to be punished further.

Encouraging that there's some branch of government, in this case on the federal level, not shy about taking on political power houses, knowing the obstacles in their way will be many.

Encouraging that Newsome's lips have loosened regarding others involved in similar schemes to buy public office, even though we suspect it has nothing to do with righting the wrongs, only a self-serving move to spend less days behind bars.

Encouraging that maybe, for once, we are not in this fight alone and have a place to turn to for help when we are willing to stand up to the machine.

The feds have helped us take that first step toward getting back what is rightfully ours which has been traded away by others in the past in back room deals. Not only do they need our help, they need our help.

This time, let's not let ourselves down.

APPENDIX -- STATUTORY TEXTS

The following are the actual statutory texts of the criminal laws referred to in the foregoing paper:

1. EXCERPTS FROM TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE

§ 241. Conspiracy against rights

If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any person in any State, Territory, or District in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; ...

They shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both; and if death results from the acts committed in violation of this section they shall be fined under this title or imprisoned for any term of years or for life, or both.

§ 242. Deprivation of rights under color of law

Whoever, under color of law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, willfully subjects any person in any State, Territory, or District to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or to different punishments, pains, or penalties, on account of such person being an alien, or by reason of his color, or race, than are prescribed for the punishment of citizens, shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and if bodily injury results from the acts committed in violation of this section shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both; and if death results from the acts committed in violation of this section imprisoned for any term of years or for life, or both.

§ 245. Federally protected activities

(a)(1) Nothing in this section shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of Congress to prevent any State, any possession or Commonwealth of the United States, or the District of Columbia, from exercising jurisdiction over any offense over which it would have jurisdiction in the absence of this section, nor shall anything in this section be construed as depriving State and local law enforcement authorities of responsibility for prosecuting acts that may be violations of this section and that are violations of State and local law. No prosecution of any offense described in this section shall be undertaken by the United States except upon the certification in writing of the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, the Associate Attorney General, or any Assistant Attorney General specially designated by the Attorney General that in his judgment a prosecution by the United States is in the public interest and necessary to secure substantial justice, which function of certification may not be delegated.

(2) Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to limit the authority of Federal officers, a Federal grand jury, to investigate possible violations of this section.

(b) Whoever, whether or not acting under color of law, by force or threat of force willfully injures, intimidates or interferes with, or attempts to injure, intimidate or interfere with--

(1) any person because he is or has been, or in order to intimidate such person or any other person or any class of persons from--

(A) voting or qualifying to vote, qualifying or campaigning as a candidate for elective office, or qualifying or acting as a poll watcher, or any legally authorized election official, in any primary, special, or general election;

§ 592. Troops at polls

Whoever, being an officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; and be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the United States.

This section shall not prevent any officer or member of the armed forces of the United States from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to the laws of the State in which he offers to vote.

§ 593. Interference by armed forces

Whoever, being an officer or member of the Armed Forces of the United States, prescribes or fixes or attempts to prescribe or fix, whether by proclamation, order or otherwise, the qualifications of voters at any election in any State; or

Whoever, being such officer or member, prevents or attempts to prevent by force, threat, intimidation, advice or otherwise any qualified voter of any State from fully exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election; or

Whoever, being such officer or member, orders or compels or attempts to compel any election officer in any State to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified to vote; or

Whoever, being such officer or member, imposes or attempts to impose any regulations for conducting any general or special election in a State, different from those prescribed by law; or

Whoever, being such officer or member, interferes in any manner with an election officer's discharge of his duties--

Shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; and disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit or trust under the United States.

This section shall not prevent any officer or member of the Armed Forces from exercising the right of suffrage in any district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to the laws of the State of such district.

§ 594. Intimidation of voters

Whoever intimidates, threatens, coerces, or attempts to intimidate, threaten, or coerce, any other person for the purpose of interfering with the right of such other person to vote or to vote as he may choose, or of causing such other person to vote for or not to vote for, any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, Presidential elector, Member of the Senate, Member of the House of Representatives, Delegate from the District of Columbia, or Resident Commissioner, at any election held solely or in part for the purpose of electing such candidate, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

§ 595. Interference by administrative employees of Federal, State, or Territorial Governments

Whoever, being a person employed in any administrative position by the United States, or by any department or agency thereof, or by the District of Columbia or any agency or instrumentality thereof, or by any State, Territory, or Possession of the United States, or any political subdivision, municipality, or agency thereof, or agency of such political subdivision or municipality (including any corporation owned or controlled by any State, Territory, or Possession of the United States or by any such political subdivision, municipality, or agency), in connection with any activity which is financed in whole or in part by loans or grants made by the United States, or any department or agency thereof, uses his official authority for the purpose of interfering with, or affecting, the nomination or the election of any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, Presidential elector, Member of the Senate, Member of the House of Representatives, Delegate from the District of Columbia, or Resident Commissioner, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

This section shall not prohibit or make unlawful any act by any officer or employee of any educational or research institution, establishment, agency, or system which is supported in whole or in part by any state or political subdivision thereof, or by the District of Columbia or by any Territory or Possession of the United States; or by any recognized religious, philanthropic or cultural organization.

§ 596. Polling armed forces

Whoever, within or without the Armed Forces of the United States, polls any member of such forces, either within or without the United States, either before or after he executes any ballot under any Federal or State law, with reference to his choice of or his vote for any candidate, or states, publishes, or releases any result of any purported poll taken from or among the members of the Armed Forces of the United States or including within it the statement of choice for such candidate or of such votes cast by any member of the Armed Forces of the United States, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

The word "poll" means any request for information, verbal or written, which by its language or form of expression requires or implies the necessity of an answer, where the request is made with the intent of compiling the result of the answers obtained, either for the personal use of the person making the request, or for the purpose of reporting the same to any other person, persons, political party, unincorporated association or corporation, or for the purpose of publishing the same orally, by radio, or in written or printed form.

§ 597. Expenditures to influence voting

Whoever makes or offers to make an expenditure to any person, either to vote or withhold his vote, or to vote for or against any candidate; and

Whoever solicits, accepts, or receives any such expenditure in consideration of his vote or the withholding of his vote--

Shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and if the violation was willful, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

§ 598. Coercion by means of relief appropriations

Whoever uses any part of any appropriation made by Congress for work relief, relief, or for increasing employment by providing loans and grants for public-works projects, or exercises or administers any authority conferred by any Appropriation Act for the purpose of interfering with, restraining, or coercing any individual in the exercise of his right to vote at any election, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

§ 599. Promise of appointment by candidate

Whoever, being a candidate, directly or indirectly promises or pledges the appointment, or the use of his influence or support for the appointment of any person to any public or private position or employment, for the purpose of procuring support in his candidacy shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and if the violation was willful, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

§ 600. Promise of employment or other benefit for political activity

Whoever, directly or indirectly, promises any employment, position, compensation, contract, appointment, or other benefit, provided for or made possible in whole or in part by any Act of Congress, or any special consideration in obtaining any such benefit, to any person as consideration, favor, or reward for any political activity or for the support of or opposition to any candidate or any political party in connection with any general or special election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

§ 601. Deprivation of employment or other benefit for political contribution

(a) Whoever, directly or indirectly, knowingly causes or attempts to cause any person to make a contribution of a thing of value (including services) for the benefit of any candidate or any political party, by means of the denial or deprivation, or the threat of the denial or deprivation, of--

(1) any employment, position, or work in or for any agency or other entity of the Government of the United States, a State, or a political subdivision of a State, or any compensation or benefit of such employment, position, or work; or

(2) any payment or benefit of a program of the United States, a State, or a political subdivision of a State; if such employment, position, work, compensation, payment, or benefit is provided for or made possible in whole or in part by an Act of Congress, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

(b) As used in this section--

- (1) the term "candidate" means an individual who seeks nomination for election, or election, to Federal, State, or local office, whether or not such individual is elected, and, for purposes of this paragraph, an individual shall be deemed to seek nomination for election, or election, to Federal, State, or local office, if he has (A) taken the action necessary under the law of a State to qualify himself for nomination for election, or election, or (B) received contributions or made expenditures, or has given his consent for any other person to receive contributions or make expenditures, with a view to bringing about his nomination for election, or election, to such office;
- (2) the term "election" means (A) a general, special primary, or runoff election, (B) a convention or caucus of a political party held to nominate a candidate, (C) a primary election held for the selection of delegates to a nominating convention of a political party, (D) a primary election held for the expression of a preference for the nomination of persons for election to the office of President, and (E) the election of delegates to a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States or of any State; and
- (3) the term "State" means a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or any territory or possession of the United States.

§ 602. Solicitation of political contributions

- (a) It shall be unlawful for--
 - (1) a candidate for the Congress;
 - (2) an individual elected to or serving in the office of Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress;
 - (3) an officer or employee of the United States or any department or agency thereof; or
 - (4) a person receiving any salary or compensation for services from money derived from the Treasury of the United States; to knowingly solicit any contribution within the meaning of section 301(8) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 from any other such officer, employee, or person. Any person who violates this section shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.
- (b) The prohibition in subsection (a) shall not apply to any activity of an employee (as defined in section 7322(1) of title 5) or any individual employed in or under the United States Postal Service or the Postal Rate Commission, unless that activity is prohibited by section 7323 or 7324 of such title.

§ 603. Making political contributions

- (a) It shall be unlawful for an officer or employee of the United States or any department or agency thereof, or a person receiving any salary or compensation for services from money derived from the Treasury of the United States, to make any contribution within the meaning of section 301(8) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to any other such officer, employee or person or to any Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress, if the person receiving such contribution is the employer or employing authority of the person making the contribution. Any person who violates this section shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.
- (b) For purposes of this section, a contribution to an authorized committee as defined in section 302(e)(1) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 shall be considered a contribution to the individual who has authorized such committee.

(c) The prohibition in subsection (a) shall not apply to any activity of an employee (as defined in section 7322(1) of title 5) or any individual employed in or under the United States Postal Service or the Postal Rate Commission, unless that activity is prohibited by section 7323 or 7324 of such title.

§ 604. Solicitation from persons on relief

Whoever solicits or receives or is in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose from any person known by him to be entitled to, or receiving compensation, employment, or other benefit provided for or made possible by any Act of Congress appropriating funds for work relief or relief purposes, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

§ 605. Disclosure of names of persons on relief

Whoever, for political purposes, furnishes or discloses any list or names of persons receiving compensation, employment or benefits provided for or made possible by any Act of Congress appropriating, or authorizing the appropriation of funds for work relief or relief purposes, to a political candidate, committee, campaign manager, or to any person for delivery to a political candidate, committee, or campaign manager; and

Whoever receives any such list or names for political purposes--

Shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

§ 606. Intimidation to secure political contributions

Whoever, being one of the officers or employees of the United States mentioned in section 602 of this title, discharges, or promotes, or degrades, or in any manner changes the official rank or compensation of any other officer or employee, or promises or threatens so to do, for giving or withholding or neglecting to make any contribution of money or other valuable thing for any political purpose, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

§ 607. Place of solicitation

(a) It shall be unlawful for any person to solicit or receive any contribution within the meaning of section 301(8) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 in any room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by any person mentioned in section 603, or in any navy yard, fort, or arsenal. Any person who violates this section shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

(b) The prohibition in subsection (a) shall not apply to the receipt of contributions by persons on the staff of a Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress, provided, that such contributions have not been solicited in any manner which directs the contributor to mail or deliver a contribution to any room, building, or other facility referred to in subsection (a), and provided that such contributions are transferred within seven days of receipt to a political committee within the meaning of section 302(e) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

§ 608. Absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters

- (a) Whoever knowingly deprives or attempts to deprive any person of a right under the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act shall be fined in accordance with this title or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.
- (b) Whoever knowingly gives false information for the purpose of establishing the eligibility of any person to register or vote under the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act, or pays or offers to pay, or accepts payment for registering or voting under such Act shall be fined in accordance with this title or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

§ 609. Use of military authority to influence vote of member of Armed Forces

Whoever, being a commissioned, noncommissioned, warrant, or petty officer of an Armed Force, uses military authority to influence the vote of a member of the Armed Forces or to require a member of the Armed Forces to march to a polling place, or attempts to do so, shall be fined in accordance with this title or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. Nothing in this section shall prohibit free discussion of political issues or candidates for public office.

§ 610. Coercion of political activity

It shall be unlawful for any person to intimidate, threaten, command, or coerce, or attempt to intimidate, threaten, command, or coerce, any employee of the Federal Government as defined in section 7322(1) of title 5, United States Code, to engage in, or not engage in, any political activity, including, but not limited to, voting or refusing to vote for any candidate or measure in any election, making or refusing to make any political contribution, or working or refusing to work on behalf of any candidate. Any person who violates this section shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

§ 911. Citizen of the United States

Whoever falsely and willfully represents himself to be a citizen of the United States shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

§ 1341. Frauds and swindles

Whoever, having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, or for obtaining money or property by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, or to sell, dispose of, loan, exchange, alter, give away, distribute, supply, or furnish or procure for unlawful use any counterfeit or spurious coin, obligation, security, or other article, or anything represented to be or intimated or held out to be such counterfeit or spurious article, for the purpose of executing such scheme or artifice or attempting so to do, places in any post office or authorized depository for mail matter, any matter or thing whatever to be sent or delivered by the Postal Service, or deposits or causes to be deposited any matter or thing whatever to be sent or delivered by any private or commercial interstate carrier, [FN2] or takes or receives therefrom, any such matter or thing, or knowingly causes to be delivered by mail or such carrier according to the direction thereon, or at the place at which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, any such matter or thing, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. If the violation affects a financial institution, such person shall be fined not more than $1,000,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

§ 1346. Definition of "scheme or artifice to defraud"

For the purposes of this chapter, the term "scheme or artifice to defraud" includes a scheme or artifice to deprive another of the intangible right of honest services.

§ 1952. Interstate and foreign travel or transportation in aid of racketeering enterprises

- (a) Whoever travels in interstate or foreign commerce or uses the mail or any facility in interstate or foreign commerce, with intent to--
- (1) distribute the proceeds of any unlawful activity; or
 - (2) commit any crime of violence to further any unlawful activity; or
 - (3) otherwise promote, manage, establish, carry on, or facilitate the promotion, management, establishment, or carrying on, of any unlawful activity, and thereafter performs or attempts to perform any of the acts specified in subparagraphs (1), (2), and (3), shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.
- (b) As used this section (i) "unlawful activity" means (1) any business enterprise involving gambling, liquor on which the Federal excise tax has not been paid, narcotics or controlled substances (as defined in section 102(6) of the Controlled Substances Act), or prostitution offenses in violation of the laws of the State in which they are committed or of the United States, (2) extortion, bribery, or arson in violation of the laws of the State in which committed or of the United States, or (3) any act which is indictable under subchapter II of chapter 53 of title 31, United States Code, or under section 1956 or 1957 of this title and (ii) the term "State" includes a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, and any commonwealth, territory, or possession of the United States.
- (c) Investigations of violations under this section involving liquor shall be conducted under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury.

2. EXCERPTS FROM TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE

§ 1973i. Prohibited acts:

False information in registering or voting; penalties

- (c) Whoever knowingly or willfully gives false information as to his name, address, or period of residence in the voting district for the purpose of establishing his eligibility to register or vote, or conspires with another individual for the purpose of encouraging his false registration to vote or illegal voting, or pays or offers to pay or accepts payment either for registration to vote or for voting shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both: Provided, however, That this provision shall be applicable only to general, special, or primary elections held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the United States Senate, Member of the United States House of Representatives, Delegate from the District of Columbia, Guam, or the Virgin Islands, or Resident Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

Voting more than once

- (e)(1) Whoever votes more than once in an election referred to in paragraph (2) shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.
- (2) The prohibition of this subsection applies with respect to any general, special, or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the United States Senate, Member of the United States House of Representatives, Delegate from the District of Columbia, Guam, or the Virgin Islands, or Resident Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.
- (3) As used in this subsection, the term "votes more than once" does not include the casting of an additional ballot if all prior ballots of that voter were invalidated, nor does it include the voting in two jurisdictions under section 1973aa-1 of this title, to the extent two ballots are not cast for an election to the same candidacy or office.

§ 1973gg-10. Criminal penalties

A person, including an election official, who in any election for Federal office--

- (1) knowingly and willfully intimidates, threatens, or coerces, or attempts to intimidate, threaten, or coerce, any person for--
 - (A) registering to vote, or voting, or attempting to register to vote;
 - (B) urging or aiding any person to register to vote, to vote, or to attempt to register to vote; or
 - (C) exercising any right under this subchapter; or
- (2) knowingly and willfully deprives, defrauds, or attempts to deprive or defraud the residents of a State of a fair and impartially conducted election process, by--
 - (A) the procurement or submission of voter registration applications that are known by the person to be materially false, fictitious, or fraudulent under the laws of the State in which the election is held; or
 - (B) the procurement, casting, or tabulation of ballots that are known by the person to be materially false, fictitious, or fraudulent under the laws of the State in which the election is held, shall be fined in accordance with title 18 (which fines shall be paid into the general fund of the Treasury, miscellaneous receipts (pursuant to section 3302 of title 31), notwithstanding any other law), or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

(Pub.L. 103-31, § 12, May 20, 1993, 107 Stat. 88.)

SUBCHAPTER B. COUNTY ELECTIONS ADMINISTRATOR

§ 31.032. APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR; COUNTY ELECTION COMMISSION.

(a) The position of county elections administrator is filled by appointment of the county election commission, which consists of:

- (1) the county judge, as chair;
- (2) the county clerk, as vice chair;
- (3) the county tax assessor-collector, as secretary; and
- (4) the county chair of each political party that made

nominations by primary election for the last general election for state and county officers preceding the date of the meeting at which the appointment is made.

(b) The affirmative vote of a majority of the commission's membership is necessary for the appointment of an administrator.

(c) Each appointment must be evidenced by a written resolution or order signed by the number of commission members necessary to make the appointment. Not later than the third day after the date an administrator is appointed, the officer who presided at the meeting shall file a signed copy of the resolution or order with the county clerk. Not later than the third day after the date the copy is filed, the county clerk shall deliver a certified copy of the resolution or order to the secretary of state.

(d) The initial appointment may be made at any time after the adoption of the order creating the position.

§ 31.035. RESTRICTIONS ON POLITICAL ACTIVITIES.

(a) A county elections administrator may not be a candidate for a public office or an office of a political party, hold a public office, or hold an office of or position in a political party. At the time an administrator becomes a candidate or accepts an office or position in violation of this subsection, the administrator vacates the position of administrator.

(b) A county elections administrator commits an offense if the administrator makes a political contribution or political expenditure, as defined by the law regulating political funds and campaigns, or publicly supports or opposes a candidate for public office or a measure to be voted on at an election. An offense under this subsection is a Class A misdemeanor. On a final conviction, the administrator's employment is terminated, and the person convicted is ineligible for future appointment as county elections administrator.

SEC. 101. PAYMENTS TO STATES FOR ACTIVITIES TO IMPROVE ADMINISTRATION OF ELECTIONS.

(a) In General.--Not later than 45 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Administrator of General Services (in this title referred to as the "Administrator") shall establish a program under which the Administrator shall make a payment to each State in which the chief executive officer of the State, or designee, in consultation and coordination with the chief State election official, notifies the Administrator not later than 6 months after the date of the enactment of this Act that the State intends to use the payment in accordance with this section.

(b) Use of Payment.--

(1) In general.--A State shall use the funds provided under a payment made under this section to carry out 1 or more of the following activities:

(A) Complying with the requirements under title III.

(B) Improving the administration of elections for Federal office.

(C) Educating voters concerning voting procedures, voting rights, and voting technology.

(D) Training election officials, poll workers, and election volunteers.

(E) Developing the State plan for requirements payments to be submitted under part 1 of subtitle D of title II.

(F) Improving, acquiring, leasing, modifying, or replacing voting systems and technology and methods for casting and counting votes.

(G) Improving the accessibility and quantity of polling places, including providing physical access for individuals with disabilities, providing nonvisual access for individuals with visual impairments, and providing assistance to Native Americans, Alaska Native citizens, and to individuals with limited proficiency in the English language.

(H) Establishing toll-free telephone hotlines that voters may use to report possible voting fraud and voting rights violations, to obtain general election information, and to access detailed automated information on their own voter registration status, specific polling place locations, and other relevant information.

SEC. 221. TECHNICAL GUIDELINES DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE.

e) Technical Support From National Institute of Standards and Technology.--

(1) In general.--At the request of the Development Committee, the Director of the National Institute of Standards and Technology shall provide the Development Committee with technical support necessary for the Development Committee to carry out its duties under this subtitle.

(2) Technical support.--The technical support provided under paragraph (1) shall include intramural research and development in areas to support the development of the voluntary voting system guidelines under this part, including--

(A) the security of computers, computer networks, and computer data storage used in voting systems, including the computerized list required under section 303(a);

(B) methods to detect and prevent fraud;

SEC. 242. STUDY, REPORT, AND RECOMMENDATIONS ON BEST PRACTICES FOR FACILITATING MILITARY AND OVERSEAS VOTING.

(a) Study.--

(1) In general.--The Commission, in consultation with the Secretary of Defense, shall conduct a study on the best practices for facilitating voting by absent uniformed services voters (as defined in section 107(1) of the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act) and overseas voters (as defined in section 107(5) of such Act).

(2) Issues considered.--In conducting the study under paragraph (1) the Commission shall consider the following issues:

(A) The rights of residence of uniformed services voters absent due to military orders.

(B) The rights of absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters to register to vote and cast absentee ballots, including the right of such voters to cast a secret ballot.

(C) The rights of absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters to submit absentee ballot applications early during an election year.

(D) The appropriate preelection deadline for mailing absentee ballots to absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters.

(E) The appropriate minimum period between the mailing of absentee ballots to absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters and the deadline for receipt of such ballots.

(F) The timely transmission of balloting materials to absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters.

(G) Security and privacy concerns in the transmission, receipt, and processing of ballots from absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters, including the need to protect against fraud.

SEC. 245. STUDY AND REPORT ON ELECTRONIC VOTING AND THE ELECTORAL PROCESS.

(a) Study.--

(1) In general.--The Commission shall conduct a thorough study of issues and challenges, specifically to include the potential for election fraud, presented by incorporating communications and Internet technologies in the Federal, State, and local electoral process.

(2) Issues to be studied.--The Commission may include in the study conducted under paragraph (1) an examination of--

(A) the appropriate security measures required and minimum standards for certification of systems or technologies in order to minimize the potential for fraud in voting or in the registration of qualified citizens to register and vote;

(B) the possible methods, such as Internet or other communications technologies, that may be utilized in the electoral process, including the use of those technologies to register voters and enable citizens to vote online, and recommendations concerning statutes and rules to be adopted in order to implement an online or Internet system in the electoral process;

(C) the impact that new communications or Internet technology systems for use in the electoral process could have on voter participation rates, voter education, public accessibility, potential external influences during the elections process, voter privacy and anonymity, and other issues related to the conduct and administration of elections;

(D) whether other aspects of the electoral process, such as public availability of candidate information and citizen communication with candidates, could benefit from the increased use of online or Internet technologies;

(E) the requirements for authorization of collection, storage, and processing of electronically generated and transmitted digital messages to permit any eligible person to register to vote or vote in an election, including applying for and casting an absentee ballot;

(F) the implementation cost of an online or Internet voting or voter registration system and the costs of elections after implementation (including a comparison of total cost savings for the administration of the electoral process by using Internet technologies or systems);

(G) identification of current and foreseeable online and Internet technologies for use in the registration of voters, for voting, or for the purpose of reducing election fraud, currently available or in use by election authorities;

(H) the means by which to ensure and achieve equity of access to online or Internet voting or voter registration systems and address the fairness of such systems to all citizens; and

(I) the impact of technology on the speed, timeliness, and accuracy of vote counts in Federal, State, and local elections.

(b) Report.--

(1) Submission.--Not later than 20 months after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Commission shall transmit to the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate a report on the results of the study conducted under subsection (a), including such legislative recommendations or model State laws as are required to address the findings of the Commission.

(2) Internet posting.--In addition to the dissemination requirements under chapter 19 of title 44, United States Code, the Election Administration Commission shall post the report transmitted under paragraph (1) on an Internet website.

SEC 302(b) Voting Information Requirements.--

(1) Public posting on election day.--The appropriate State or local election official shall cause voting information to be publicly posted at each polling place on the day of each election for Federal office.

(2) Voting information defined.--In this section, the term "voting information" means--

(A) a sample version of the ballot that will be used for that election;

(B) information regarding the date of the election and the hours during which polling places will be open;

(C) instructions on how to vote, including how to cast a vote and how to cast a provisional ballot;

(D) instructions for mail-in registrants and first-time voters under section 303(b);

(E) general information on voting rights under applicable Federal and State laws, including information on the right of an individual to cast a provisional ballot and instructions on how to contact the appropriate officials if these rights are alleged to have been violated; and

(F) general information on Federal and State laws regarding prohibitions on acts of fraud and misrepresentation.

(c) Voters Who Vote After the Polls Close.--Any individual who votes in an election for Federal office as a result of a Federal or State court order or any other order extending the time established for closing the polls by a State law in effect 10 days before the date of that election may only vote in that election by casting a provisional ballot under subsection (a). Any such ballot cast under the preceding sentence shall be separated and held apart from other provisional ballots cast by those not affected by the order.

(d) Effective Date for Provisional Voting and Voting Information.--Each State and jurisdiction shall be required to comply with the requirements of this section on and after January 1, 2004.

SEC. 904. REVIEW AND REPORT ON ADEQUACY OF EXISTING ELECTORAL FRAUD STATUTES AND PENALTIES.

(a) Review.--The Attorney General shall conduct a review of existing criminal statutes concerning election offenses to determine--

- (1) whether additional statutory offenses are needed to secure the use of the Internet for election purposes; and
- (2) whether existing penalties provide adequate punishment and deterrence with respect to such offenses.

(b) Report.--The Attorney General shall submit a report to the Committees on the Judiciary of the Senate and House of Representatives, the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate, and the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives on the review conducted under subsection (a) together with such recommendations for legislative and administrative action as the Attorney General determines appropriate.

SEC. 905. OTHER CRIMINAL PENALTIES.

(a) Conspiracy To Deprive Voters of a Fair Election.--Any individual who knowingly and willfully gives false information in registering or voting in violation of section 11(c) of the National Voting Rights Act of 1965 (42 U.S.C. 1973i(c)), or conspires with another to violate such section, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, in accordance with such section.

(b) False Information in Registering and Voting.--Any individual who knowingly commits fraud or knowingly makes a false statement with respect to the naturalization, citizenry, or alien registry of such individual in violation of section 1015 of title 18, United States Code, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, in accordance with such section.

Concerning

The Voting Rights Act: Sections 6, 7 and 8– Federal Examiner and Observer Provisions

November 15, 2005

Chairman Chabot, Ranking Member Nadler, distinguished members of the Subcommittee:

Thank you for inviting me to talk this afternoon about the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

There are three central questions on the retention of the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act:

1. Are the federal examiner and federal observer provisions still needed?

The federal observer provision is still needed. Most of the federal examiner provisions are no longer are needed.

2. Should the initial assignment of federal observers to a jurisdiction remain dependent on the certification of the jurisdiction for federal examiners?

No, but a certification-like decision should be required when federal observers are initially assigned to a jurisdiction.

3. Should the federal observer provision remain solely as a law enforcement tool, or should the findings of the observers be made immediately available to the public?

The federal observer provision should remain as a law enforcement function. Publication of the observers' findings would be detrimental to that function.

The following is an overview of the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act, my experience with them, and the reasons why I have answered the questions as I have. This recitation is followed by a detailed explanation of the Voting Rights Act's provisions for federal examiners and observers—Sections 6, 7 and 8 of the Voting Rights Act—and fact situations and federal court cases that demonstrate why the federal observer provisions are still needed.

The federal examiner and federal observer provisions had a real impact on African Americans in the South.

I was a lawyer in the United States Justice Department's Civil Rights Division from 1966 until my retirement in January 2000. Beginning in 1973 I was partly, and shortly thereafter, wholly in charge of the Justice Department's responsibilities for the federal examiner and federal observer programs. But I began working in the Civil Rights Division as a law clerk in the summer of 1965, and I was there on August 6, 1965, when the Voting Rights Act became law. Shortly after the Act was passed I was assigned to accompany the many other employees of the Civil Rights Division who were working out of an office set up in the federal building in Selma, Alabama. Our primary job was to investigate the beatings suffered by people who earlier that year attempted to march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama, to protest the disenfranchisement of African Americans in Alabama.

I traveled with Civil Rights Division lawyers from county to county in West Central Alabama to determine the identity of the victims of those beatings and to interview them. As we traveled, we also got information on possible violations of the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and we stopped into the offices where federal examiners were giving African Americans their first easy, safe and fair opportunity to register vote. (Local voter registration hours and locations were so restrictive that some white people took advantage of the easy federal voter registration opportunities too.)

Those events gave rise to the issues we are addressing now, 40 years later. A discussion of these issues can easily get blurred by a numbing recitation of legal statutes, provisions and clauses, because that is how the Voting Rights Act is written. I will set out those citations later in my statement by providing sections of an article my wife and I published in the Spring 2002 edition of the Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review. But first I want to review the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act as they applied to people and voting in the real world.

Under the structure of the Voting Rights Act, a federal examiner can be assigned to any site in the states and counties that are specially covered under the Act's formulae in Section 4, after the county has been certified by the Attorney General of the United States (or in any county certified by court order). Of course, under the structure of the Voting Rights Act, the federal examiners do not technically register people to vote: they examine applicants as to their eligibility under state voter registration laws that are otherwise Constitutional, and then put those applicants who are found to be eligible on a list. The list is given to the local county voter registrar who is required by the Voting Rights Act to enter the eligible applicants' names on the local voter registration rolls.

In the summer and fall of 1965 people were lined up day after day to take advantage of their first opportunity to register to vote. The federal examiners were Civil Service Commission investigators who had been pulled off of the routine jobs they had been doing and sent to sites in Alabama and other Southern states that had been designated by the U.S. Attorney General for federal listing. Besides listing voter applicants, the examiners were available to take complaints about listed people who had not been placed on the county voter registration rolls.

Those examiners were not, on the whole, a happy group. Their presence in small groups of two or three was obvious in town, and their work was opposed by many of white people there. In the main, they ate alone, walked alone and talked mostly to each other. The examiners were eager to know from us, on our rounds, when they would be able to go home. Still, they persevered, and in the end they accounted for the registration of tens of thousands of people who had been discriminatorily kept off of the voter registration rolls. From 1965 to 1972 federal examiners were responsible for the registration of over 170,000 voters. They achieved a signal victory in the fight against racial discrimination in voting.

As the Voting Rights Act is structured, federally registered voters have continuing protection against attempts at keeping them from voting. In any county that has been certified for a federal examiner, the Voting Rights Act authorizes the United States Office of Personnel Management (the successor to the United States Civil Rights Commission) to assign federal observers to polling places as requested by the U.S. Attorney General, to watch voting and vote counting procedures. (Note that the certification of a county for federal examiners is a prerequisite for the assignment of federal observers, but the presence of federally listed voters in the county is not.)

That protection was badly needed in the mid-1960s for newly registered African American voters as they entered the polling places and weathered the stares of white voters and the hostility of the polling place officials. Some examples of the humiliations they faced are set out later in my statement. But for now it is enough to know that they, too, persevered, and under the protective presence of the federal observers, they cast their ballots and participated in the political life of the county for the first time.

The federal observers' job is to watch and take notes. If polling place officials choose to violate their own procedures in order to humiliate racial or minority language voters, or intimidate them, or refuse to allow them the same voting privileges in the polls as the white voters, the federal observers cannot intervene. The observers in a county have co-captains who travel from polling place to polling place, checking with the observers and getting information from them. Those observer co-captains call regularly to a central office established by the Office of Personnel Management. Originally, and for many years, this central office was known as the examiner's office, which had been established for the examiner to take complaints as is required by Section 12(e) of the Voting Rights Act. In the examiner's office there also was a lawyer from the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division (usually from the Voting Section, nee Voting and Public Accommodations Section). Today, since the examiner has little or no function, especially in a county where there are no federally registered voters, the office used in the county on election day is referred to as the captain's office. The observer captain along with a Civil Rights Division attorney are there to receive the calls and the information from the observer co-captains.

When irregularities arise the Division lawyer relays the information about the irregularities to the county official in charge of the election, and allows the county official to take action to correct the irregularities. Where corrective action is not taken or is inadequate, a civil action can be filed later under the Voting Rights Act. A civil action, such as the one described below involving Conecuh County, Alabama, can use the reports of federal observers as effective and unassailable evidence of racially discriminatory actions of polling place officials. After the election the observers provide their reports to the federal examiner, the Attorney General and, if appropriate, to a federal court (if the county is certified for an examiner by a court).

The work of the federal observers as described here continued in the South largely unchanged through the 1990s. These procedures apply too, to the work of federal observers in other areas of the country with important modifications to deal with geographical differences and activities in polling places involving minority language voters.

Federal observers are necessary, federal examiners are not necessary.

Violations of the Voting Rights Act continue to happen in polling places throughout the United States. The need for federal observers to document discriminatory treatment of racial and language minority voters in the polls has not waned. The use of a thousand or more federal observers at election after election beginning in 1965 decreased to the use of hundreds of observers at elections after the early 1980s as a result of the effective enforcement of the Voting Rights Act in Southern states. But the enforcement of the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act, added in 1975, has required the use of hundreds more federal observers to disclose to Justice Department attorneys evidence of harassment of members of language minority groups, and instances where ballots and other election material and procedures are not available to those voters in a language they can understand. The result is that between 300 and 600 federal observers continued to be needed annually from 1984 to 2000.

The facts supplied by federal observers to Civil Rights Division attorneys are crucial and irreplaceable in the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act. Most parts of the voting process are open to the public, and the evidence of Voting Rights Act violations that are involved in the voting process can be obtained by Justice Department lawyers through routine investigations. But most state laws limit access to polling places on election day, allowing only voters and polling place officials to remain in the polls (police are allowed too when called to deal with disturbances). Thus, unless an exception is made in these rules to allow federal investigators to get special access to the polls, the harassment of racial and minority language voters and other violations of the Voting Rights Act inside the polling places would go unseen and unchecked.

Federal observers have special access to polling places under the authority of the Voting Rights Act even where access to Justice Department attorneys is otherwise barred. Federal observers thus become the attorneys' eyes and ears. The discriminatory treatment of racial and minority language voters witnessed by the federal observers, as discussed in detail below, runs the gamut from actions that make those voters feel uncomfortable by talking rudely to them, or ridiculing their need for assistance in casting their ballot, to actions that bar them from voting, such as failing to find their names on the lists of registered voters and refusing to allow them to vote on provisional ballots, or misdirecting them to other polling places.

Minority language voters suffer additional discriminatory treatment when people who speak only English are assigned as polling place workers in areas populated by minority language voters. The polling place workers fail to communicate the voting rules and procedures to the voters, or fail to respond to the voters' questions. In some instances, qualified registered voters have been told that they are not permitted to vote because they have not furnished necessary information, such as their address, even when they have provided the information; the poll worker was unable to understand what the voters were saying, but a speaker of the minority language would have understood.

Civil Rights Division lawyers who receive facts from federal observers about violations of the Voting Rights Act provide those facts directly to the election officials in the jurisdictions involved, allowing them to take corrective action in compliance with the Act. In other instances, those facts are used to secure court orders requiring that the jurisdictions involved to comply with the dictates of the Voting Rights Act. In either approach, the end result fulfills the goal of the Voting Rights Act to allow United States citizens to cast their ballots on election day freely and fairly, without distinction because of their race or membership in a language minority group.

That the work of the federal observers is a part of a law enforcement effort—the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act—is especially true where the information from the federal observers is provided in the context of a lawsuit, where a court has certified a county that was not specially covered under the Voting Rights Act. In that situation, the information is given to the court and affects the position of the parties (the Justice Department and the county) with respect to the actions the jurisdiction must take to comply with the Act (the relief that is ordered in the case). Some local election officials have come to welcome the information obtained by federal observers as an additional source showing the extent to which the county's polling place officials are complying with the provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

However, the initial assignment of federal observers to a county today remains dependant on the certification of the county for the assignment of federal examiners even though federal examiners are largely unnecessary any more for listing voter applicants. There has been no federal listing of voters since the 1970s, apart from an isolated flurry of voter listing in Georgia in 1982 and another isolated flurry in Mississippi in 1983. Discriminatory actions against racial and language minority group members are not caused by their status as federally registered voters. And examiners no longer receive complaints on election day with respect to federally listed voters. I do not recall any complaints that were received centering on mistreatment of federally listed voters over the last 20 years of my supervision of the federal observer and examiner programs, and few, if any such complaints before that. (Complaints about other matters are made to the examiner, but they routinely involve matters for which the federal observers have been assigned to the county, and are just as easily, and more effectively fielded by the federal observer captain in the county.) Moreover, the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act and the enactment of new easy voter registration laws, such as the National Voter Registration Act (the motor voter law), have made the possibility of future listings by federal examiners highly unlikely.

Further, the Office of Personnel Management must continue to keep the lists of federally listed voters up to date regarding changes of name, changes of address and, as the years have gone by, of deaths. Those voters cannot be removed from the voter rolls without the approval of the Office of Personnel Management, and the lists continued to be provided for election day use by those counties where there are federally listed voters. In fact, these lists are no longer used for any practical purpose, and their maintenance should be discontinued.

It is possible that federal examiners may be needed in the future for voter listing in a situation where the dictates of the Voting Rights Act are met, so the Voting Rights Act's authorization for federal examiners to conduct listing activity should be retained. But there is no reason to continue to tie the assignment of federal observers to the appointment of a federal examiner. I believe that, apart from the possible need for listing voters, the federal examiner provisions are outdated and are no longer needed in the Voting Rights Act, especially the requirement that an examiner be appointed as a prerequisite for the assignment of federal observers to a county.

But the procedure for the certification of a county for federal examiners under Section 6 of the Act serves an important purpose: it requires the Justice Department to conduct an intensive investigation to support the certification, and thus makes the federal government responsible for taking action regarding local election procedures only on the basis of complete and compelling facts. I believe that some manner of certification should remain a prerequisite for the initial assignment of federal observers to a county and, once certified, that a county would remain certified, as is now the case, until it acted to eliminate the certification (the formula under Section 13 for terminating certification would be changed).

If such a new certification procedure would be instituted, the requirement that the United States Attorney General personally must sign the certification, as is now the case, would be unnecessary. This authority for executing a certification should be allowed to be delegated to the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. To my recollection, the Attorney General has signed every certification that has been recommended by the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. Nor would the Attorney General's signature be needed any more to assure the importance of the certification if the only consequence of a certification would be simply to allow federal observers to witness polling place procedures. The delegation to the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights of the responsibility for a certifying a county for the presence of federal observers would be similar to the delegation of authority to the Assistant Attorney General to object to changes in voting practices and procedures under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

The purpose of the present requirement in the Voting Rights Act that the Attorney General's certification of a county be published in the Federal Register is to give notice of the location of the federal examiner's office. Since it no longer will be necessary to have an office for a federal examiner when federal observers are assigned, the publication of the location of that office also will be unnecessary. Those who will most need to know of the assignment of federal observers—county officials and minority group representatives—always are informed personally by Civil Rights Division attorneys, and other members of the community easily learn of the observers' presence from Division attorneys, local press reporting and word of mouth.

Accordingly, I believe that the federal observer provision is still necessary to the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, but the Voting Rights Act no longer should tie the assignment of federal observers to the appointment of a federal examiner. The Act should allow a certification function, newly directed only to the assignment of federal observers, to be delegated to the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. The requirement for publication of the certification in the Federal Register—an adjunct of the federal examiner function—should be eliminated as a prerequisite to the initial assignment of federal observers.

Federal observers' work should continue to be a law enforcement function.

I also recommend that the function of the federal observers remain as it is: as witnesses in a law enforcement function. The question arises because, since my retirement, I have been an observer four times in other countries as a part of an international observer corps assembled by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) under its Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR). The forms these observers use list polling place procedures and have a place for the observer's rating from good to bad (1 to 3, or 1 to 5) for each procedure. There are separate forms for the opening of the polls, for voting during the day, and for the closing of the polls. A fourth form allows for fuller explanation of any item or event.

The object of the observation by ODIHR is to report information for public consumption as quickly as possible. During election day the observers send their forms to ODIHR headquarters in the country's capitol at mid-morning, shortly after noon, and just before the polls close; the remaining forms are dropped off when the observers return from the vote count to their regional lodging sites throughout the country. This way, by the afternoon of election day OSCE/ODHIR knows how the election is going, whether there are serious problems, and if so, what they are and where they are. Then, on the morning after the election, OSCE issues its judgment on whether the election was conducted according to international standards or was marred by irregularities.

But OSCE is not a law enforcement organization, and its approach would not be appropriate to the job of the Justice Department. Some of the irregularities that the federal observers can witness are not dissimilar from the kind of procedural irregularities that are common to elections held in emerging democracies. The extra identification steps required of Arab Americans in Hamtramck, Michigan, and the harassment they encountered, described below, are an example. But the similarity of some situations to those addressed by international observer groups such as the OSCE does not argue for redesigning the federal observer program under the Voting Rights Act to resemble those organizations' efforts.

In fact, the federal observer program is an effective law enforcement program as it is now constituted. If observers are desired to watch polling place activities for other purposes, those functions should be performed by other observers serving other functions. "Domestic" observers in other countries are allowed into the polling places to get information for their candidates, or political parties, or organizations, and routinely publicize the activities they witness. Those countries' elections, however, are conducted centrally, by a central (in the U.S. it would be a federal) election commission, and the observers' activities are under that central control. The laws of those countries specifically allow domestic as well as international observers into the polling places. The observers are granted permission to be in the polls and are issued identification tags for that purpose by the central or district election commissions, which can withdraw that permission at any time.

This kind of observation is not a matter within the purview of existing federal legislation in this country, and to have federal legislation allowing these kinds of observers in polling places a record would have to be established by the United States Congress justifying their presence in connection with federal elections. On the other hand, in the United States access to the polling places is controlled by state law, and some states allow such observers into the polling places now. States routinely also allow the press into the polls to witness the activities there. Finally, redacted versions of the federal observers' report forms may be obtained under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) subject to the FOIA rules and the Privacy Act.

The following analysis provides the specific support for my conclusion that the federal observer provision of the Voting Rights Act should be continued because it is clearly needed to provide the Justice Department with evidence of violations of the Voting Rights Act's prohibitions against discrimination in the polling places against racial and language minority group members. This analysis is taken from an article my wife and I wrote for the Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review, Spring 2002 edition, Vol. 2, Number 11.

The special provisions of the Voting Rights Act were compelled by resistance to African Americans' voting rights.

Congress had found that case-by-case litigation was inadequate to combat widespread and persistent discrimination in voting, because of the inordinate amount of time and energy required to overcome the obstructionist tactics invariably encountered in these lawsuits. After enduring nearly a century of systematic resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress might well decide to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victims.

South Carolina v. Katzenbach, supra at 328.

The Voting Rights Act (the “Act”) cut through the protective barrier of federalism with two important sections. Section 5 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c (the “preclearance” provision), required federal review of any new voting procedures that states and counties might adopt. This prohibited the adoption of new discriminatory practices when a jurisdiction’s present practices were found to be unlawful. And Section 4 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b, instantly led to the enfranchisement of thousands of people by suspending the use of literacy tests and similar discriminatorily applied barriers to the registration of African Americans in the Deep South.¹ Some states, such as Virginia, immediately stopped using literacy tests. In other Southern states, federal examiners were appointed under Section 6 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973d, assigned to counties to conduct fair voter registration under Section 7 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973e, when white county officials refused to stop their racially discriminatory voter registration practices.² This was no small task, as over 170,000 people were registered between 1965 and 1972 through the efforts of the federal examiners, mostly in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi. Semiannual Report of Cumulative Totals on Voting Rights Examining as of

¹ These “tests or devices” were suspended in states and counties determined by a formula in Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b, based on the use of literacy tests and other pre-application devices (such as having current voters vouch for your good moral character), and low voter turnout. Later, this provision was made permanent and nationwide. 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa. Originally, states and counties covered under the formula in Section 4 of the Act could terminate their special coverage (“bail out”) after five years by showing in a lawsuit before a three-judge court in the federal district court for the District of Columbia, that no test or device had been used to deprive anyone of the right to vote during that period. Since the Act itself suspended those tests or devices for only 5 years, it was thought that it would be relatively simple for states and counties who complied with the suspension to bail out after the 5-year period. In 1970 the time period in Section 4 was extended to 10 years, in 1975 it was extended to 17 years. In 1982 the approach was changed, and the special coverage under Section 4 will expire 25 years after August 5, 1984, the effective date of the 1982 Amendments, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(a)(8). In 1982 the bail-out provisions were amended substantially to allow individual counties within a fully covered state to bail out, and to set out a number of specific qualifications that a jurisdiction needs to meet in order to bail out. 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(a)(1)-(3).

² The examiners are commonly referred to as federal registrars. These were people appointed by the head of the Civil Service Commission, now the Office of Personnel Management, to examine voter applicants as to their qualifications under state law. If the applicants satisfied the state requirements, their names were put on a list that was given to the county registrar, who then had to add them to the county voter registration rolls. In this way, some semblance of state authority over the voter registration process was preserved: registrants satisfied state requirements, and a state-authorized official put the voters’ names on the rolls. 42 U.S.C. § 1973e(b). To safeguard against discriminatory purges of those newly enfranchised voters, their names cannot be purged from the voter rolls without the approval of the Office of Personnel Management. 42 U.S.C. § 1973e(d).

December 31, 2000, Prepared by the Office of Workforce Information, Office of Merit Systems Oversight and Effectiveness, U.S. Office of Personnel Management. See Appendix A for the number of people, by state, registered by federal examiners.

Further, in order to allow the U.S. Attorney General to know whether discriminatory action was taken against the newly enfranchised voters in the polling places on election day, Section 8 of the Act allowed that, whenever an examiner has been appointed,

[T]he Director of Personnel Management may assign, at the request of the Attorney General, one or more persons, who may be officers of the United States, (1) to enter and attend at any place for holding an election...for the purpose of observing whether persons who are entitled to vote are being permitted to vote, and (2) to enter and attend at any place for tabulating the votes cast at any election...for the purpose of observing whether votes cast by persons entitled to vote are being properly tabulated.

Thus, the use of federal observers in polling places initially was directed at protecting the rights of new voters who had been registered by federal examiners. Even though federal voter registration was rare after 1972, the predicate under the Voting Rights Act for assigning federal observers has not changed: federal observers continued to be allowed only in counties that had been certified by the U.S. Attorney General for federal examiners. As a result, to allow the assignment of federal observers to a county, the county had to be certified by the U.S. Attorney General or a federal court (under Section 3(c) of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973a(c)) for federal examiners.³ The assignment of federal observers continues to be a cornerstone of the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act. Over 23,000 federal observers have been assigned to monitor polling place procedures since 1966, 4,393 since 1990 alone.⁴ See Appendix B, Assignment of Federal Observers Under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973f, by Year and State.

⁴ There were 4,698 federal observers assigned to polling places in 5 states from 1966 through 1969; 7,034 federal observers were assigned to 9 states in the 1970s; 6,598 federal observers were assigned to 11 states in the 1980s, and 3,753 federal observers were assigned to 13 states in the 1990s. In 2000, 640 federal observers were assigned to 11 states. See, Appendix B.

Federal observers were able to note and document a wide variety of discriminatory actions that were taken against African Americans in the polls. Some of these actions were insulting and direct, as are reflected in the United States' responses to interrogatories in United States v. Conecuh County, Alabama, Civil Action No. 83-1201-H (S.D. Ala., Jun 12, 1984).⁵ See Appendix C.

While providing assistance to a black voter, white poll official Albrest asked, "Do you want to vote for white or niggers?" The voter stated that he wanted to give everyone a fair chance. Albrest proceeded to point out the black candidates and, with respect to one white candidate, stated, "This is who the blacks are voting for." Poll official Albrest made further reference to black citizens as "niggers" in the presence of federal observers, including a statement that "niggers don't have principle enough to vote and they shouldn't be allowed. The government lets them do anything."

Plaintiff's Response to Interrogatories and Request for Production of Documents, p. 6.

White poll workers treated African American voters very differently from the respectful, helpful way in which they treated white voters. When questions arose about the voter registration data for a white person, such as a person's address or date of registration, or when a white person's name was not immediately found on the poll books, the voter was addressed as Mister or Misses, was treated with respect, and the matter was resolved on the spot. If the voter's name was not found, often he or she either was allowed to vote anyway, with his or her name added to the poll book, or the person was allowed to vote a provisional or challenged ballot, which would be counted later if the person were found to be properly registered. If, however, the voter was black, the voter was addressed by his or her first name and either was sent away from the polls without voting, or told to stand aside until the white people in line had voted. African American voters were not allowed to take sample ballots into the polls, and were made to vote without those aids (it was claimed by white officials that the sample ballots were campaign material which was prohibited inside the polls).

African American voters who were unable to read and write, due in large part to inferior segregated schools and the need to go to work in the fields at an early age, were refused their request to have someone help them mark their ballot, notwithstanding the Voting Rights Act's bar on literacy tests. In some instances, white poll workers would loudly announce the African American voter's inability to read or write, embarrassing the voter in front of his or her neighbors. Some white poll workers went so far as to bring a magnifying glass to the polls, and give it to African American voters, challenging the voter to read using the magnifying glass in front of everyone present at the polling place. Illiterate white voters, on the other hand, were allowed assistance by a person of their choice without comment. White couples routinely were allowed to enter the voting booth together to mark their ballots.

⁵ The federal observers' reports are not public documents, so there are very few examples on the public record of the facts that the observers have witnessed. One such public document is the Plaintiff's Response to Interrogatories and Request for Production of Documents in United States v. Conecuh County, Alabama, supra. Some of the specific examples of the kind of discriminatory treatment that was afforded African American voters described in the text that follows are taken from the excerpts of the Conecuh County responses at Appendix C, while others are based on the author's first-hand knowledge.

In instances where African American voters were allowed an assistor in the booth, arbitrary rules were concocted that limited the number of voters an assistor could help, or made the assistor wait outside the polling place, requiring the voter to enter the polls alone and negotiate alone the sign-in procedures administered by unfriendly white poll workers, before being allowed to ask that the assistor be allowed to help.⁶ All too often, when the voter said he or she needed assistance the white poll worker would proceed to help the voter, and not give the voter a chance to ask for the assistor the voter wanted; the voter did not know if the poll worker cast the ballot as the voter desired, and had no confidence that the ballot was cast correctly.

Moreover, racial discrimination in the polls is not limited to African Americans, and is not limited to the South. On November 2, 1999, in the City of Hamtramck, Michigan, the qualifications of more than 40 voters were challenged on grounds that they were not citizens. They were challenged by members of a group known as Citizens for a Better Hamtramck (CCBH), organized to keep elections pure. As described in the Consent Order and Decree in United States v. City of Hamtramck, Civil Action No. 00-73541 (E.D. Mich, Aug 7, 2000),

6. ...Some voters were challenged before they signed their applications to vote. Other voters were challenged after they had signed their applications and their names had been announced. The challenged voters had dark skin and distinctly Arabic names, such as Mohamed, Ahmed, and Ali. The challengers did not appear to possess or consult any papers or lists to determine whom to challenge.

7. Once challenged, the city election inspectors required the challenged voters to swear that they were American citizens before permitting them to vote. Voters who were not challenged were not required to do so. The city election inspectors did not evaluate the propriety of merit of the challenges. Some dark-skinned voters produced their American passports to identify themselves to election officials. Nevertheless, these persons were challenged by CCBH, and the election inspectors required them to take a citizenship oath as a prerequisite to

⁶ After the Voting Rights Act enabled African Americans in the Deep South to register to vote, it became common for civil rights workers and local African American residents to drive the new voters to the polls and to give assistance to those who needed it. This was a natural outgrowth of the organizing required during the civil rights movement to achieve voter registration for black people. It provided transportation—many people did not have cars—and gave confidence and protection to these newly enfranchised voters at the polling places from which they had so recently been excluded by white poll workers and voters who did not want them there. This tradition of “hauling” voters to the polls and giving assistance to voters who need it continues today, especially in many rural areas.

The consent decree also states that city officials were apprised of the incidents, that they consulted with state election officials who were present in Hamtramck on election day, but neither the state nor the city election officials prevented the baseless challenges from continuing. It was claimed that other Arab-American citizens may have heard about the incidents and decided not to go to the polls to vote that day.

Federal observers witnessed clear discrimination against language minority group members at the polls.

Besides discriminatory treatment of citizens based on race, citizens who speak English poorly, or not at all, have faced obstacles to voter registration and voting. In 1975 Congress took note of discrimination against people who have only a limited ability to speak English. For them, printing or providing information only in English as effective as a literacy test in keeping them from registering to vote or casting an effective ballot. Such disenfranchisement was outlawed when the Voting Rights Act was amended and expanded in 1975. The terms of Section 4 of the Act, containing the formula for applying special coverage to counties, were changed to include among prohibited tests and devices,

[T]he practice or requirement by which any State or political subdivision provided any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance or other material or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, only in the English language, where the Director of the Census determines that more than five per centum of the citizens of voting age residing in such State or political subdivision are members of a single language minority.

42 U.S.C. § 1973b(f)(3). Language minorities are defined in the Voting Rights Act as American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives, and people of Spanish heritage. 42 U.S.C. § 1973l(c)(3). Political subdivisions as defined in the Act usually are counties. 42 U.S.C. § 1973l(c)(2).⁷

The 1975 amendments to the Act required that when the newly covered jurisdiction

...provides any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, it shall provide them in the language of the applicable language minority group as well as in the English language...

⁷ The jurisdictions subject to the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act are listed in the Appendix to 28 U.S.C. Part 51.

42 U.S.C. § 1973b(f)(4)⁸

Counties in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah were certified for federal examiners, and federal observers were assigned to document the extent to which the English language was used in areas where many of the voters spoke Native American languages but understood English only marginally. Similarly, federal observers have been assigned to polling places in Spanish language areas of Arizona, Texas, New Jersey and New York City, and Chinese language areas of New York City, and San Francisco and Oakland, California.⁹ In all these areas minority language citizens were allowed to register to vote, but the use of the English language instead of the voters' first language prevented them from understanding the voting instructions and the ballot. Polling place workers either were not able to speak the language of the voters, or if they could, were not trained to translate the documents and procedures into the language of the voters. By the 1990s federal observers were assigned to monitor discrimination against language minority group members in numbers equal to the federal observers assigned to monitor non-language racial discrimination.¹⁰

The need for the language minority provisions of the Voting Right Act continues to be demonstrated in areas of the country where English is not persons' primary language. Normally one would assume that polling place workers would be chosen from the population where the polling place is located, and that they would speak another language in addition to English with the same frequency as the voters. In many instances, however, this did not happen. For example, in ethnically changing neighborhoods in New York City, the choices of the political party apparatus resulted in the repeated appointment of English-speaking poll workers where a large portion of the new voters in a precinct were Spanish-speaking Puerto Ricans. In Passaic, New Jersey, English-speaking poll workers were unable to find the names of Spanish-speaking voters

⁸ A parallel requirement was added in Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act in 1975 for counties determined by different formula. 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1a. Section 203 of the Act does not include the other special provisions of Section 4, such as the preclearance, federal examiner and federal observer provisions. Lawsuits under Section 203 must be brought before a three-judge court. As a result of amendments since 1975, coverage under Section 203 now applies to counties that have more than 5 percent of voting age citizens who are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; have more than 10,000 voting age citizens who are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; or have a part of an Indian reservation, and more than 5 percent of the American Indian or Alaska Native voting age citizens are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; and the illiteracy rate of the language minority group citizens is higher than the national illiteracy rate. 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1(a)(2). The counties covered under the language minority provisions of Sections 4 and 203 are listed in the Appendix to 28 U.S.C. Part 55.

¹⁰ From 1990 through 2000, there were 2,449 federal observers assigned to elections in the states of the Deep South, very few of which involved discrimination against language minority group members, and there were 2,215 federal observers assigned to monitor elections in other areas of the country, most of which involved discrimination against language minority group members. See Appendix B.

in the polls books because the poll workers did not know that the voters' family name traditionally was the second of three names they used. Some voters were denied the ballot because they identified their street name according to common Spanish usage rather than the formal English name.¹¹ In Texas and Southern Arizona polling places Hispanic voters were admonished not to use Spanish when talking in the polling places and when giving assistance to voters who needed help when voting. Moreover, the citizenship of Hispanic voters was questioned at the polls, with voters being required to somehow provide on-the-spot evidence of their citizenship before being given a ballot; such evidence was not required of Anglo voters.¹²

Evidence of other kinds of discriminatory behavior of polling place workers and others toward Spanish language voters inside the polls is provided in the reports of the Independent Elections Monitor appointed in September 2000 by the court in a consent decree in United States v. Passaic City, New Jersey, and Passaic County, New Jersey, Civil Action No. 99-2544 (NHP) (D.N.J., Sep. 5, 2000)(three-judge court).

At P.S. 6, observers called to report that the challenger was making racist remarks about Hispanics. At the Ukrainian school, challengers became very aggressive and were yelling at voters, stating that they did not live in the country and should not vote. Ironically, many of these challenged voters were off-duty Passaic City police officers. Angel Casabona, Jr. was one such challenged police officer who avoided confrontation and properly came to Passaic City Hall to have his voting status clarified. Escorted by the City Clerk and investigators from the prosecutor's office, Mr. Casabona reentered the polling site and was permitted to exercise his vote. The brazen challenger was reprimanded and board workers were reminded that challengers should not be interacting with voters.

Walter F. Timpone, Office of the Election Monitor, Fifth Report, June 15, 2001, pgs. 3-4.

The most disturbing incident of the [June 26, 2001 municipal primary election] occurred at the polling place at St. Mary's School in Passaic. Someone allegedly stole the flag from outside the polling place. The police were called. An officer responded and caught the purported perpetrator. The Officer entered the polling place and asked who had called the police. No one responded. The officer barked comments in substance to the poll workers as follows, "Can't you read? What country do you come from?" When a municipal worker of Indian origin came to see what the problem was, the officer then asked, "And what country do you come from?" When a Latino federal observer tried to explain the dictates of the consent decree, the officer asked for credentials. When the observer showed his credentials, the officer found them inadequate because they lacked a picture and detained the observer. The Officer told the observer, "I could arrest you for this." Upon being alerted to the controversy, I asked investigators from the Passaic County Prosecutors Office and Deputy Chief of the Passaic County Police Department to intercede. When a Sergeant from the Passaic Police department responded at the scene and learned what had happened, he apologized to the federal observer and told him he thought some sensitivity training might be in order for the officer. Notably, this discriminatory behavior took place in a city where the Latino population is at 62%. Intolerance in the city is still existent and hiding under color of official right.

¹¹ Mail addressed to streets using the Spanish nickname was delivered because the postal personnel were familiar with the local Spanish language usages, as the poll workers were not.

Walter F. Timpone, Office of the Election Monitor, Sixth Report, July 27, 2001, pp. 6-7.

The use of English rather than Chinese in polling places in Chinese neighborhoods of San Francisco and Oakland (Alameda County), California, and New York City left voters confused about procedures, and ignorant of ballot propositions and contested offices. As was noted in the Settlement Agreement and Order in United States v. Alameda County, California, C95 1266 (N.D. Cal, Jan 22, 1996)(three-judge court),

According to the 1990 Census, the population of Alameda County includes 68,184 Chinese Americans and 30,120 Chinese American citizens of voting age. The 1990 Census reports that 11,394 persons, or 37.83 percent of the Chinese citizen voting age population in Alameda County, and 1.3 percent of the total citizen voting age population in Alameda County do not speak English well enough to participate effectively in English language elections. Thus, over 11,000 Chinese American citizens in Alameda County cannot function effectively in the electoral process except in the Chinese language.

Problems were compounded in Native American areas of Arizona, New Mexico and Utah. The problems faced by Native Americans in these areas are illustrated in Cibola County, New Mexico, which contains the Ramah Chapter of the Navajo Reservation and the Acoma and Laguna Pueblos. The Stipulation and Order in United States v. Cibola County, New Mexico, No. Civ 93 1134 LH/LFG, (D.N.M., Apr 21, 1994)(three-judge court), states that,

5. According to the 1990 Census, 57.8 percent of the Navajo voting age population and 18.1 percent of the Pueblo voting age population in Cibola County do not speak English well enough to participate effectively in English language elections. Thus, a significant proportion of the Native American population of Cibola County, and a significant majority of Navajos, cannot function in the electoral process except in the Navajo or Keresan languages.

6. The Navajo and Keres populations of Cibola County live in circumstances of significant isolation from the non-Native American population of the county. Cibola County is unusually large in physical terms, and covers a geographic area roughly the size of the State of Connecticut. Over four-fifths of the non-Native American population lives clustered within or near the adjacent incorporated communities of Grants and Milan, close to the county courthouse. The Acoma and Laguna population centers are between 25 and 50 miles away from Grants, the county seat, while the Ramah Chapter House is approximately 50 miles from Grants. The isolation of the Native American population of Cibola County burdens their access to the franchise.

8. Native American citizens living within Cibola County, suffer from a history of discrimination touching their right to register, to vote, and otherwise to participate in the political process. Until 1948, Native American citizens of New Mexico were not permitted to vote in state and local elections. Trujillo v. Garley, C.A. No. 1350 (D.N.M., August 11, 1948). In 1984, the court in Sanchez v. King, C.A. No. 82-0067-M (D.N.M. 1984) held that the New Mexico state legislative redistricting plan discriminated against Native Americans.

9. The level of political participation by Native American citizens of Cibola County is depressed. Voter registration rates in the predominantly Native American precincts have been less than half the rate in non-Native American precincts, and Native Americans are affected disproportionately by voter purge procedures. Although Native Americans comprise over 38 percent of the county population, fewer than eight percent of all absentee ballots have been from the predominantly Native American precincts. There is a need for election information in the Navajo and Keresan languages, and a need for publicity concerning all phases of the election process for voters in Ramah, Acoma and Laguna. The rate of participation by Native Americans on such issues is less than one third of the participation rate among non-Native Americans. There is a need for polling places staffed with trained translators conveniently situated for the Native American population.

The remedy for this unlawful disparity is complicated by the facts that (1) the Navajo and Pueblo languages are oral, not written, and (2) there are no equivalent terms in the Navajo and Pueblo languages for many words and phrases in the election process.

Native American polling place workers in reservation precincts faced a more difficult task than white poll workers in getting to the training session for poll workers that were held many miles away in county seats where most white people lived. At the training sessions Native American poll workers were given little or no instruction about how to translate ballots and propositions, and many of their attempts to do so on election day resulted in the most rudimentary references. For example, poll workers assisting voters at the polls would refer to the office of secretary of state as someone who works in the state capitol, and bond levies for education were said simply to be increases in taxes. Many times the Native American poll workers found it so difficult to figure out how to explain items on the ballot they just instructed the voters to skip the offices or propositions. Moreover, Native American voters who had been purged from the voter rolls because they failed to respond to written notices they either did not receive¹³ or did not understand, were turned away from the polls with no explanation of why they were not able to vote, and were given no opportunity to re-register there.¹⁴

Pre-election investigation can pinpoint where federal observers should be assigned.

The task of assuring compliance by polling place workers with appropriate polling place procedures requires (1) knowledge of what is happening in the polling places, and (2) the authority to correct actions that are in violation of the prescribed procedures. For over 35 years DOJ has been determining, before each election, what will happen in specific polling places in particular counties in states far from Washington, D.C. Based on this information DOJ determined at which polling places discriminatory activity would take place, and the exact number of federal observers needed at each particular polling place, from among the hundreds of counties in the 16 states that are fully or partially covered under Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act,¹⁵ and the 10 additional jurisdictions in other states that have been and remain certified by courts under Section 3 of the Act.¹⁶

This DOJ effort, known as a pre-election survey, is conducted by the Voting Section of DOJ's Civil Rights Division. Pre-election surveys began right after the Voting Rights Act was enacted, as a tool for determining where and how many federal observers would need to be assigned under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act. Through the years

¹⁴ Voters were confused because they voted in tribal elections without problem, and were not told, for example, that under state law they had been purged from the county voter rolls because they did not vote with some particular frequency and in particular elections, such as every two or four years in general elections. To add to the confusion, in many areas the tribal elections and the state elections were held on different dates but at the same locations. Prior to the National Voter Registration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg et seq., voter registration in many counties in Indian country was conducted in the county seat, far from reservation housing, until, in some instances, litigation required that deputy registrars be made available at reservation sites, and that voter purge procedures be modified to allow fair notice to Native American voters. United States v. State of Arizona, CIV 88-1989 PHX EHC (D. Ariz., May 22, 1989), pgs. 6-11; First Amended Consent Decree, Jan. 3, 1994, pgs. 5-10.

the pre-election surveys have remained relatively unchanged for determining where racially discriminatory actions (as contrasted with language-based difficulties) would occur in the polling places of the Deep South. This process is instructive on a broad level because it can be used, with variations, by states throughout the country to determine, prior to election day, where problems will occur on election day in polling places across the state.

The DOJ focus during the pre-election surveys is to find circumstances that are likely to lead to actions that will disadvantage voters in the polls on election day. To allow black voters to vote without interference in the South, the Voting Section focuses on counties where black candidates are facing white candidates. Those are the circumstances where experience has shown that polling place workers are more apt to take actions that deprive African American of their right to vote. Moreover, the inclination of polling place workers to take discriminatory action against African American voters is more likely when the black candidates have a real chance of beating white opponents. (For concerns about other kinds of problems at the polls, the pre-election survey would focus on the facts and antipathies relating to those problems.)

The surveys consist of two rounds of telephone calls and a field investigation. The first round of phone calls begins about six weeks before the election, which is a time when candidate qualifying has been completed and campaigning has been in progress. The Voting Section contacts the election director in each county where the minority population is about 20% or more, since a relatively small but concentrated portion of a county's population can be a significant proportion of a single election district in a county. The Voting Section determines a number of facts from each county election official they contact, including the name and race of the candidates, the office each is contesting, which candidates are incumbents, the county's procedures for appointing polling place workers, and the county's procedures for responding to problems that arise on election day. The second round of telephone calls is made to at least two African American people in each county who are familiar with the way elections have been conducted in the county during recent elections, who know who the candidates are and how the candidates have been conducting their campaigns, and who are knowledgeable about relationships between the races in the county and whether there have been any recent racial incidents in the county.

Voting Section attorneys then travel to the counties where the facts from the two rounds of telephone calls indicate that the assignment of federal observers is needed because poll workers will make it difficult for black voters to cast their ballots for the candidates of their choice. The attorneys interview the county election officials, the county sheriff (or chief of police, if a city election is in issue), African American county residents, including people associated with community and civil rights organizations, and candidates. The attorneys relay their information and their recommendation as to whether federal observers should be assigned for the election, and, if so, number and placement of federal observers that will be needed on election day, to a Voting Section supervisor who coordinates the survey.¹⁷ The polling places that are selected for the assignment of observers are (1) those at which the facts show that African American voters are likely to be victimized on election day, where (2) the county has no effective way to either know what is happening in the polls, or for responding to problems that occur at the polls, or both.

During the pre-election surveys the Voting Section supervising attorney talks frequently with the Voting Rights Coordinator at the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) who recruits and supervises the people who serve as observers.¹⁸ Thus, OPM is aware of the identity of the counties that are the subject of field investigations, and of the recommendations of the attorneys for the assignment, numbers and poll location of federal observers. Because of the ongoing coordination between the Voting Section and OPM, the federal observers are chosen and are ready to depart for their assigned location the moment a final decision is made by the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights as to the numbers and placement of the observers.¹⁹

Information from federal observers is obtained quickly and effectively on election day.

The pre-election process not only gives DOJ information it needs to determine where and how many federal observers will be needed on election day, it puts DOJ lawyers in contact with county election officials before the election, and the DOJ lawyers inform the county officials of the problems that DOJ has found out may occur in the county's polls on election day. This contact continues during the election, as the DOJ lawyers provide the county election officials with information the lawyers get from the observers.

¹⁸ Federal observers are assigned and supervised by the Office of Personnel Management. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973f. OPM centralized the observer program in the OPM office in Atlanta, Georgia, over the past several years. Beginning in 2002 the program will be centralized in the OPM office in Denver, Colorado.

There is no standing group of people who are federal observers. Rather, the people chosen to serve as federal observers at a particular election are volunteers, usually from among the OPM nationwide staff except when special abilities are required, such as Native American language ability. General training sessions are held for observers and observer supervisors at selected sites during the year. Often people will volunteer to serve as observers in election after election, but they are not always available because of the demands of their regular work assignments and prior obligations. Because of the need to recruit observers for each election, and the logistical requirements of transportation (airplane tickets, rental car) and lodging, the OPM coordinator and the Voting Section supervising attorney are in contact throughout the year to discuss observer needs in upcoming elections.

¹⁹ If a county for which federal observers is recommended has not been certified yet for federal examiners, a separate recommendation for certification of the county is made to the U.S. Attorney General, and a certification form is prepared for the U.S. Attorney General's signature. Also, because certifications are effective upon publication in the Federal Register, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(b), arrangements are made for publication as soon as possible after the U.S. Attorney General signs the certification. Similar arrangements are made by OPM which must publish in the Federal Register a location for an examiner's office. 42 U.S.C. § 1973e(a).

The observers are briefed by DOJ attorneys and the observer captain on the day before the election. The observers get to their assigned polling place one-half hour before the poll opens, and usually will remain until the last person leaves the poll. They have pre-printed forms on which to record the activity in the polls. Observers usually also attend the ballot count and record the number of votes received by each candidate.

During election day an observer supervisor makes repeated visits to the polling places where federal observers are stationed, and remains in constant telephone contact with the DOJ attorney who is in the county. This gives the DOJ attorney in the county a constant flow of information throughout the day about activities that transpire inside the polls.²⁰ When the federal observers inform the DOJ attorney of actions of polling place officials that the attorney concludes are interfering with the voting rights of African Americans, the DOJ attorney gives the facts to the local official in charge of the election, which allows him or her to stop the discriminatory activity. Local officials also can use this information after the election to take steps to prevent the incidents from happening again.

Similar steps are taken on election day when federal observers are used to determine compliance with the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act, but normally the pre-election preparation is different. The inability or lack of desire of poll workers to provide information to non-English speaking voters usually does not depend on the identity of the candidates or the issues involved in a particular election. Thus, the information obtained in one election will allow a determination of whether federal observers will be needed in the next election.²¹

The reports of these federal observers have their primary emphasis on the language aspects of polling place procedures and the actions of polling place workers. (The federal observers assigned to a particular polling place speak the minority language that is used by the voters at that polling place.) It usually is not important that the observers arrive at the opening of the polls, nor that they stay all day, since the goal is to have the observers attend the polls for a sufficient length of time to witness a number of minority language voters go through the voting process. This will give the observers sufficient facts to allow the DOJ attorneys to analyze the county's compliance with the law.

We should emphasize that the federal observers do not interfere with the election process. Their limited function, to pass along information to their OPM supervisors and the DOJ attorneys, is in accord with the dictates of Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973f. The observers must not give instructions to poll workers, must not give help to voters, and must not share their observations, judgments or opinions with individuals in the polls. They are eyes and ears. They are paid witnesses.²²

²⁰ In addition, the DOJ attorney in each county calls the supervising attorney often during the day: when the polls open, and every hour after that until it is clear that correct procedures are being followed at the polls in that county, unless continuing problems and their resolution make it necessary to continue frequent contact. This coordination between the supervising attorney and the attorney in the field begins on the day before the election, and does not end until the attorney leaves the county to return to Washington, D.C., on the day after the election or later.

The federal observers' reports allow Justice Department attorneys to require counties to comply with their states' rules.

In its enforcement of all federal civil rights laws the Department of Justice (DOJ) attempts to obtain voluntary compliance from prospective defendants. This has been especially true of the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act where the prospective defendants are officials of state and local governments.

From the beginning of DOJ's enforcement of the Voting Rights Act DOJ lawyers personally conducted investigations in each county before examiners or observers were assigned, regularly checked on the progress of examiners while voter registration was conducted, and on election day a DOJ attorney was and continues to be present in each county to which federal observers are assigned to obtain information from the observers during election day, and debrief the observers immediately after the election. During their presence in the counties the DOJ lawyers have continuing contact with county officials, and give them the information the lawyers gain as part of their pre-election investigation in the county, and from the federal observers. Those local officials, faced with the immediate and continuing presence of DOJ lawyers, usually instruct the head worker at the polling place to follow the appropriate procedures.

The federal observers inside the polling place witness the cessation of the discriminatory action, or if the discriminatory action continues, the DOJ lawyer again brings the information from the observers to the attention of the county election official to get further corrective action. Thus, federal observers function both to gather evidence of discriminatory activities in the polling place for future legal action, and for the elimination of discriminatory actions on the spot. At times, the mere presence of federal observers at the polls serves to inhibit the tendency of many polling place workers to take discriminatory action against African American voters.

Some compulsive action is needed when county election administrators do not address outstanding problems in the polls, and do not follow proper election day procedures. A primary reason for the mistreatment of African American voters was and continues to be the failure of local election officials to appoint African Americans as polling place workers. The evidence of mistreatment that this discriminatory policy had on African American voters has provided a firm basis for court orders that required the defendants to take specific steps to recruit and hire African Americans to work in the polls. One good example of this result is the consent decree in United States v. Conecuh County, Alabama, supra, which required the defendant political party executive committees (responsible for nominating people to serve as poll workers) to “engage in affirmative recruitment efforts aimed at ensuring that the pool of persons from which nominations are made fully reflects the availability of all qualified persons in Conecuh County who are interested in serving as election officials, without regard to their race or color.” at pp. 3-4.

Those recruitment efforts were required to include encouraging candidates to “seek out and propose for nomination black citizens,” and “sending notices to local organizations comprised predominantly of black citizens...to advise them that the party intends to nominate persons to serve as election officials and encourage them to have interested persons notify the chairperson of the respective political party executive committee of their willingness to serve as election officials,” at p. 4.

A 1993 consent order in United States v. Johnson County, Georgia, CV393-45 (S.D. Ga, Sept 14, 1993) stated that,

1. According to the 1990 Census, the total population in Johnson County is 34 percent black and the total voting age population is 29.2 percent black.

* * * * *

7. Of the one hundred thirty one individuals who were employed by Johnson County to serve as poll officials between 1988 and August 1992, eighteen (14%) were black. There were no black poll workers during this period at seven of the twelve polling places.

8. Only eight (12%) of the Sixty-six poll officials employed by Johnson County for the July 21, 1992 primary election were black. There were no black poll workers at eight of the twelve polling places.

9. Of the one hundred and six poll officials employed by Johnson County for the November 3, 1992 general election, only sixteen (15%) were black. There were no black poll workers at six of the twelve polling places.

10. No black person has ever served as a managing poll officer or an assistant managing poll officer at any of the county’s polling places.

Included in the Johnson County consent decree among the steps the defendant county commission and supervisor of election must take to have African Americans fairly represented among the polling place workers are, “sending written notices to local organizations comprised predominantly of black citizens ...to advise them that the county intends to appoint black persons to serve as poll workers and poll managers;” and “contacting black candidates and members of the political parties...to ascertain the names, addresses and telephone numbers of black citizens who are qualified and available to serve as poll officers.” Id. at 6. In addition, the defendants must publicize in local newspapers, on radio, on television and on posters their policy of conducting elections free of racial discrimination. They also must train the poll workers on how to perform their duties in a racially nondiscriminatory manner, and, with specificity, on how to deal with voters who need assistance.

Even with the specific steps set out in the 15 page Johnson County consent decree, the reports of federal observers showed that African American citizens of the Johnson County were continuing to be excluded from among the ranks of those appointed to work at the polls because the supervisor of elections did not adhere to the terms of the decree. After further discussions between the county and DOJ, in lieu of DOJ pursuing contempt of court proceedings the county appointed a biracial committee formed of county residents to perform the preliminary poll worker recruitment and nomination functions previously performed by the election supervisor, leaving her with her statutory duty of formally appointing the poll workers. (This change in practice was reviewed and precleared under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973c.) As a result, African Americans were fairly appointed among those who worked at the polls, and discrimination against African American voters at the polls abated in Johnson County, Georgia.

Both the Conecuh County and Johnson County cases show how information gathered by observers can serve as the evidentiary basis for litigation, how particular individuals at the county level can persist in discriminatory procedures in spite of state law and federal litigation, and how the identity and training of the people working inside the polling places is of primary importance in eliminating injustice from the polls. It should be remembered that in both instances the DOJ lawyers first shared their information with state and local election officials in an attempt to allow those officials to eliminate the discriminatory treatment of voters. These efforts provided the election officials with something they could obtain by themselves, but did not: information about what went wrong in their polls. The need for the resulting litigation demonstrated that those officials were not willing to stop the discriminatory conduct.

Court-ordered remedies require counties to do their jobs for language minorities.

Even after the Voting Rights Act was amended in 1975 to require that areas designated under a formula must provide information and ballots in languages other than English, inadequate training of polling place workers continued to disadvantage minority language voters. The reports of federal observers gave the attorneys from the Department of Justice the information they needed to prove to county officials that violations of the Voting Rights Act had occurred, and to obtain consent decrees that set out specific steps that the counties would take to effectively provide and translate election information to Native American citizens.

Most of the consent decrees to cure discriminatory actions in Indian country under the language minority provisions of Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1a, were lengthy and set out in detail the procedures that election officials had to follow for voter education, voter registration, translation and balloting.²³ It is significant that the great majority of the provisions in the consent decrees focused on the counties' administrative responsibilities, including hiring additional county personnel, to try to give Native American voters equivalent access to information about an election and voting procedures as white people got as a matter of course, since all information was provided in English and in areas near the county seats.

Thus, the Stipulation and Order in United States v. Cibola County, New Mexico, No. Civ 93 1134 LH/LFG, (D.N.M., Apr. 21, 1994)(three-judge court), is 44 pages long, 33 pages of which is a Native American Election Information Program. This program provides that, "Cibola County shall employ at least three Native American Voting Rights Coordinators who will coordinate the Native American Election Information Program in Cibola County..." These coordinators have to be bilingual in either Navajo or Keres and English, they are to be hired only after the county consults with the tribes, they are to be trained in all aspects of the election process, they are to attend and make presentations at chapter and tribal council meetings, and perform numerous, specifically described functions that would provide election information to the Native American citizens of Cibola County.

It was and remains difficult, however, to compel obdurate county clerks and other county election administrators to perform the myriad election-connected functions in a way that meets the requirements of the court orders.²⁴ These cases argue persuasively for continuing the practice of seeking lengthy, detailed court orders that can be enforced through contempt proceedings.

²⁴ A letter of understanding was developed between DOJ and San Juan County, New Mexico, which required the county to adopt a manual of procedures to comply with the language minority requirements of the Voting Rights Act. The manual would become final after review and concurrence by DOJ. Changes in the procedures would become effective upon the concurrence of DOJ. Letters of understanding have not been widely used by DOJ in its Voting Rights Act enforcement. The letters have the advantage of getting a fast remedy and avoiding the uncertainties of litigation. The main disadvantage of using a letter of understanding is the inability to seek contempt of court sanctions if the county does not follow the steps in the letter or the county's manual of procedures. If the actions that the county fails to take are significant, a legal action would need to be filed at that time, prolonging the time for obtaining a remedy.

An alternative approach was taken in a consent decree between DOJ and Bernalillo County, New Mexico, where the court order was accompanied by a manual of procedures to comply with the language minority requirements of the Voting Rights Act. United States v. Bernalillo County, New Mexico, CV-98-156 BB/LCS (D.N.M. Apr 27, 1998). The consent decree required that the county hire a native language coordinator who is bilingual in Navajo and English, and specifically noted that, "The primary responsibility of the [native language coordinator], a full-time employee of Bernalillo County, shall be to carry out the county's Navajo language election procedures, publicity and assistance, including assisting the county to carry out the procedures in the manual..." at p. 4. The consent decree also required the county to establish a travel, supply, and telephone call budget for the native language coordinator, and subjected the county to the preclearance provision in Section 3(c) of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973a(c), which allows the county to make changes in the manual and for DOJ to review those changes to determine that they are nondiscriminatory before they can be implemented. This approach has the benefit of allowing the county to tailor its administrative procedures to its particular personnel and office situation, and of allowing practical changes to be made in the administrative procedures when necessary without having to request the three-judge court for an amendment to the court order.

Conclusion.

The federal observer provision of the Voting Rights Act continues to be extraordinarily effective in allowing the United States Department of Justice to enforce the Voting Rights Act. That provision should be extended.

The federal examiner provisions of the Voting Rights Act have accomplished their goal of allowing African American voter access to the voter rolls in areas where official resistance kept them from becoming registered voters. Those provisions have done their job and should be eliminated, especially insofar as they are prerequisites for the assignment of federal observers.

The federal observer provision of the Voting Rights Act performs an effective law enforcement function as it is written and applied. That provision should not be altered.

APPENDIX C

EXCERPTS FROM PLAINTIFF'S RESPONSE TO INTERROGATORIES AND REQUEST FOR PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS, United States v. Conecuh County, Alabama, Civil Action No. 83-1201-H (S.D. Ala., Jun 12, 1984).

A white voter waiting in line to vote stated to white poll official John P. Bewley that she was unable to obtain a yellow sample ballot distributed by the Alabama Democratic Conference. The black voter standing next in line had such a ballot. Mr. Bewley stated, "You ain't [sic] of the right color." During the same day, Mr. Bewley stated to federal observer Riddle, "See, the niggers bring in these yellow marked ballots. The nigger preachers run the niggers down here, you know. They tell them how to vote. I don't think that's right."

Poll officials instructed white registered voters to confirm their registration status in the office of the Probate Judge. Black voters whose names were not on the list were in each instance simply told that they could not vote, and were given no instruction by poll officials. White voter Salter's name did not appear on the list, and Ms. Salter acknowledged that she resided in a rural precinct and not in box 11-1. Ms. Salter nevertheless was allowed to vote an unchallenged ballot directly on the machine.

Pp. 8-9.

Ms. Lewis, who required assistance because of a vision problem, signed the poll list and stated that she wished for her companion (unidentified) to provide assistance in voting for her. White poll official Windham stated, "Can't nobody go in there with you." After a pause, Mr. Windham stated to Ms. Lewis, "you can fill out an affidavit and then she can go in with you. Can't you [read]?" Mr. Windham's tone and manner were sufficiently abrasive that Ms. Lewis left the voting place. Some moments later she was observed to remark to a companion, who was trying to persuade her to make another attempt to vote, "I've done had trouble with them twice before and I'm not begging them any more. I'm not scared but I'm not begging anybody." Ms. Lewis returned accompanied by Mr. Richard Rabb, at that time the Chair of the Conecuh county Branch of the Alabama Democratic Conference. Ms. Lewis was allowed to vote, and the poll officials provided necessary assistance with the affidavit. Ms. Lewis remind very upset and remarked, "Why couldn't they have let me vote to begin with?"

Pp. 16-17.

Black voters at box 9-1 (Old Town) were told throughout the day of the October 12, 1982 special run-off election, that no more than two voters were allowed in the polling place at one time. This restriction was imposed on 30-35 occasions. In no instance were white voters required to conform to this procedure, and the poll officials allowed a many as five white voters in the polling place at a time.

P. 21.

Ms. Stacey enforced the limitation on the amount of time a voter could spend in the booth in a random and discriminatory fashion. She enforced the limitation against black voters more frequently than against white voters. During the last hour of voting the requirement was applied exclusively against black persons. On at least two occasions she told black voters that their time had elapsed when, in fact, it had not.

P. 24

During the course of the day, poll officials addressed all black voters by their first names. Older white voters were addressed by the courtesy titles of Mr. and Ms.

P. 35

White poll official James Ellis initiated new procedures for assistance of black voters. Without notice to any person, Mr. Ellis required assistors accompanying voters into the polling place to remain 30 feet outside the polls until Mr. Ellis had finished interviewing the voter and summoned the assistor.

Pp. 36-37.

Poll officials who assisted black voters did not read the ballot to the voters or otherwise advice the voters of the contests and the candidates. They simply asked the voters, "Who do you want to vote for?"

* * * * *

Poll official Lois Stacey marked the ballot for a voter she was assisting in contests in which the voter did not express a preference.

* * * * *

Poll officials frequently served as assistors without asking voters receiving assistance who they wanted to assist them. On a number of occasions, poll officials serving as assistors did not read the complete ballot to the voters.

Any person violating any provision of this notice is guilty of a class 2 misdemeanor.

Apache County Elections are conducted pursuant to the guidelines set forth under the Federal Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Protocol Guidelines:

Political Observer Protocol:
A.R.S. § 16-590

Statute allows for a political observer and an alternate to be appointed by the County Chairman of each party that has a candidate on the ballot for each polling place in the County.

The Apache County Elections Department in their efforts to carry out this law, feel the importance of establishing polling place protocol for Voters, Election Board Workers and Observers.

This will insure that questions or issues, no matter where or when they may occur during Election Day, are handled as quickly and efficiently as possible with minimal disruption to the voter and to the Election Board.

Political Appointment

If you have been appointed as a Political Observer you must have in hand your signed appointment when entering the Polling Place to show to the Inspector, Marshal or other member of the Election Board.

Questions or Concerns

If you have questions or concerns, please use the following procedure. If you are observing in a Reservation Precinct, your first point of contact needs to be the "Troubleshooter" for that precinct.

The Troubleshooter

This person has been appointed by the Elections Department to oversee all processes in that precinct.

The Troubleshooter has been instructed to contact our office with your concern(s).

Contact Us Direct

If for some reason, you are unable to contact that person, please call the Elections Department directly at 1(800)361-4402 or (928)337-7537 and ask for Margaret A. Coalter, Recorder or Penny L. Pew, Elections Director. We would ask that you not contact the Precinct Inspector.

Polling Place Etiquette

A number of polling places will be ver crowded, therefore we ask that you conduct your observing as quietly as possible. You may not enter a voting booth, unless it is your precinct and you are entering the voting booth to mark your ballot.

Please Don't Touch the Ballots

While you are allowed by law to observe many processes or areas where ballots are being handled, you are not allowed to touch any ballot(s) or voting equipment.

"no person shall be allowed to remain inside these limits while the polls are open, except for the purpose of voting; and except the election officials, [and] representatives who have been appointed by the county chairman, and the challengers allowed by law." INTRODUCTION

This training manual has been prepared, printed and delivered to you by the Apache County Elections Department. Through this training manual, your attendance in a training class and the help of your fellow Polling Place Workers on Election Day, we are sure that you will be successful in assisting us in carrying out our mission, a successful election. If at anytime you feel the need to ask questions, feel free to contact the Elections Office at 337-7537 or the Hotline (800) 361-4402 on Election Day.

DUTIES OF BOARD MEMBERS

You will find the various positions that you might be assigned to here in the next few paragraphs, be sure to familiarize yourself with all of them - You never know which job you will end up doing on Election Day.

INSPECTOR

1. Arranges with custodian or chapter official for access to polling place for the Monday meeting and Election Day. Be sure to ask for alternate phone numbers! At 5:30 in the morning on Election Day a phone number to the secretary's desk will not do anybody any good, make sure you get a pager/cell phone number or a home phone number.
2. Calls the rest of your Board to let them know when the set-up meeting will take place.
3. Conducts the Monday pre-election meeting.
4. Is responsible for instructing the Clerks, Marshals and Judges in their duties.
5. Fills any vacancy on the board which exists at the opening of the polls at 6:00 a.m., or which may occur during the day. In filling vacancies, the Inspector shall appoint a qualified elector.
6. Is Chairman of the election board and must be consulted regarding procedures.
7. Assigns duties to board members.
8. Along with 2 Judges, makes up the official voting election board and votes on challenges.
9. Oversees the Accu-Vote procedures. Never leave the Accu-Vote unattended!
10. Completes and signs the certification on the cover of the Signature Roster after the polls close.
11. Shall deliver the ballots and materials to the designated receiving site along with one of the Judges of the opposite party affiliation (if applicable).
12. Responsible for duties of the Marshal, if a Marshal is not appointed.
13. Oversees Provisional Ballot procedure.

14. May transmit results over a phone line to a Central Computer site.
15. Is responsible for completion and accountability of the Precinct Ballot Report.
16. Is responsible for official ballot security.
17. Shall make sure the Troubleshooter takes the Accu-Vote Memory Pack to Election Central in St. Johns.

JUDGE

1. Verify voter's name on Signature Roster.
2. Issues ballots and demonstrates marking the ballot.
3. Manages Accu-Vote.
4. Is a voting member of the Election Board.
5. May accompany the Inspector when delivering the ballots to the designated receiving site.
6. Is assigned to do Provisional Ballots.
7. Any other duty assigned by the Inspector.

CLERK

1. Enters names on the Poll List and checks for accuracy.
2. Any other duty assigned by the Inspector.

MARSHAL

1. Preserves order; acts as constable during the time the polls are open.
2. Performs as relief person for other board members.
3. Announces the opening of the polls, and, at 5 different times, the closing of the polls.
4. Post signs before the polls open.
5. Ensures all voters in line at 7:00 P.M. are allowed to vote.
6. May assist in the delivery of Accu-Vote to regional computer site after polls have closed.
7. Directs voters in line with "voted" Early Ballots to step out of the line and deposit their ballots into the side slot of the Black Ballot Box.
8. Any other duty assigned by the Inspector.

MONITOR

1. Help voters find their address in the alpha-listing to determine residence. Assist the voter in any questions he/she may have regarding elections. Keeps a log of questions.

TRANSLATOR

Verbally read the ballot in the Navajo language so that the voter understands the ballot information.

DO NOT TELL THEM HOW TO VOTE ON THE ISSUES

TROUBLESHOOTER IS THE LIAISON BETWEEN THE POLLING PLACE AND ELECTION CENTRAL. PLEASE UTILIZE THEIR HELP AS NEEDED.

PRE-ELECTION WEEK

TROUBLESHOOTERS:

There will be a Troubleshooter assigned to your Polling Place; he/she acts as a liaison between Election Central and the Polling Places on Election Day. The troubleshooter carries extra supplies and is in direct contact with the Elections Office, should any question arise.

THE INSPECTOR:

- You will receive a Board Worker Roster at the training class; this has the name and phone number of the contact person at your Polling Place. You are to call the contact person and arrange a Set-Up meeting to take place the Monday before the Election (unless otherwise specified).
- Once the set-up meeting has been arranged, you are to call all of your Board Workers to let them know when and where they need to be for the meeting. Do this as soon as possible. DO NOT SET-UP THE POLLING PLACE PRIOR TO NOON ON MONDAY.

MONDAY SET-UP MEETING

Many election boards will have new members who have never served before. For their benefit, the Inspector should:

- > Discuss, in detail, the duties of each board position
- > Assign each board member his/her duties
- > Discuss the voting procedures to be followed on Election Day
- > Review the Accu-Vote unit procedures

-  Survey the areas to make certain all outlets are in working order.
-  Double-check with the facility PRIOR to Election Day to make certain the phone line is accessible on Election Night for the transmitting of the results.
-  Discuss with poll workers the importance of staying at the polling place from 5:30 a.m. until the polling place paperwork is completed and results are transmitted.

MONDAY SET-UP MEETING - ENDING PROCEDURE

- Before leaving the polling place, put the Official Ballots in a secure place, (locked)

BRING FOOD, BEVERAGES AND REQUIRED MEDICATIONS ON TUESDAY, ELECTION DAY.

DONT FORGET TO BRING THE KEYS BACK ON ELECTION DAY!!!

CHECKING SUPPLIES

- o Using the keys located in the side pocket of the Accu-Vote unit, unlock all compartments on the Black Ballot Box to make sure they are empty. (Key with black key guard)
- o Using the small silver key, unlock the supply box and use the Inspector Checklist to make sure all supplies are there. If any supplies are missing, please let the Election Director know at the training meeting. Lock the supply box back up.
- o Count all ballots. If they are sealed, they DO NOT have to be re-opened; they are in packages of 50.
- o DO NOT CALL THE HOTLINE IF SUPPLY QUANTITIES DO NOT MATCH. INDICATE ON THE INSPECTOR'S CHECKLIST THE CORRECT QUANTITIES AND USE THOSE FIGURES TO CLOSE OUT AFTER THE ELECTION.

SETTING UP THE ACCU-VOTE

- ◆ Make sure that the precinct name on the Accu-Vote is the correct precinct.
- ◆ Move the entire unit to the electrical outlet nearest the polling place exit.
- ◆ Unlock the door on the front of the Black Ballot Box. Slide the Accu-Vote unit in place. Attach the power card and plug it into the Accu-Vote.
- ◆ Unlock the door on the top of the Accu-Vote machine in preparation of printing the "Zero Report".
- ◆ Print the "Zero Report". After printing DO NOT TEAR OFF. Fold it up and re-lock the door.
- ◆ Make sure that there are zeros on the tape.
- ◆ The unit is now ready to receive ballots.

INSPECTIONS

CHECK YOUR BALLOTS

- ✓ Count the packages of official ballots. They are pre-wrapped in packages of 50. DO NOT OPEN THE PACKAGES TO COUNT THE BALLOTS.
- ✓ Write the total number of ballots on the Inspector Checklist and also on the Precinct Ballot Report (located in the Poll List).
- ✓ The Inspector initials the Inspector Checklist & Ballot Report.
- ✓ Check the top ballot in each package to make sure you have received all the correct ballots.

MAKE SURE YOU HAVE THE CORRECT BALLOTS AND THAT YOU GET A GOOD COUNT OF THE BALLOTS THAT YOU RECEIVED. YOU MAY HAVE MORE THAN ONE BALLOT STYLE TO ISSUE THE VOTER. MAKE SURE IT IS THE CORRECT BALLOT!

SET-UP BOOTHS

- All booths assigned to your precinct shall be set up and used, including the booth for the disabled. An instructional diagram is on each booth.
- Arrange the voting booths so they are in plain view of the board and the voters.

INSPECTION OF VOTING BOOTHS

- Election officials should periodically check the voting booths and remove any miscellaneous items such as notes, campaign literature, etc.
- Make sure the appropriate signs are hanging in each booth - ENGLISH AND SPANISH:
 - o How to mark the ballot
 - o Ballot Issues (if applicable)
- Remove any ball point pens or pencils found in the booths.
- Make sure each booth has a Black Ballot Marking Pen.

RED INK

EARLY (ABSENTEE) VOTERS

- Using the list of Early Voters, make an EV in the box next to the voter's name on the Signature Roster for each voter whose name appears on the list. Use a RED PEN. Leave room for the voter to sign.
- If the Early Voter's name does not appear alphabetically in the Signature Roster in the list of active voters or the list of inactive voters, check the Add-On list in the back of the roster.

POSTING SIGNS

- Post the WRITE-IN CANDIDATES SIGN found in the election supplies in PLAIN VIEW in the polling place. ONLY IF THERE ARE QUALIFIED WRITE-IN CANDIDATES.
- Tape the list of authorized write-in candidates on the WRITE-IN CANDIDATES SIGN. (if applicable)
- Post in PLAIN VIEW in the room where the ballots are cast:
 - o 2 SAMPLE BALLOTS (OF EACH BALLOT STYLE)
 - The sample ballots are in the Supply Box.
 - o 2 INSTRUCTIONS TO VOTERS AND ELECTIONS OFFICERS SIGNS/RIGHT TO VOTE A PROVISIONAL BALLOT COMBO SIGNS
 - o Post the NO SMOKING signs
 - o Post the INSTRUCTIONS ON MARKING THE BALLOTS in each voting booth - ENGLISH and SPANISH and the Ballot Issues (if applicable).

ELECTION DAY

The law requires members of the election board to be present at the polling place by 5:30 a.m. on Election Day. A.R.S. §16-666(A)

BEFORE THE POLLS OPEN

Election Board members must take the Oath found on the inside cover of the Blue Poll List or at the end of this manual. The Blue Poll List can be found in the supply box with the other election supplies.

WRITE THE NAME OF THE PRECINCT ON THE FRONT OF BOTH POLL LISTS.

Any elector of the precinct may administer and certify the oath; however, it is traditionally administered by the Inspector to the Board Members. Afterward, one board member administers the oath to the Inspector. You may also read this aloud together.

After the oath has been administered, election board members shall not leave the polling place until the polls are closed.

$ $ ONCE THE BOARD HAS BEEN SWORN IN

MAKE SURE THAT EVERYONE SIGNS THE PAYROLL VOUCHER AND IF CLAIMING MILEAGE, LICENSE PLATE #!!

FINAL COMPLETION OF THE POLLING PLACE SET-UP

1. Plug in the Accu-Vote. A zero tape will print. ALL RESULTS ON THE TAPE MUST BE ZERO. DO NOT TEAR OFF THE TAPE! It must remain attached to the Accu-Vote. The readout must also register zeros.
2. While the tape is printing, check the arrangement of the polling place to be sure the voting booth and Accu-Vote are in plain view.
3. The Marshal places the three 75 FOOT LIMIT signs in 3 different directions 75 feet from the MAIN ENTRANCE to the polling place. ALL OTHER SIGNS MUST BE PLACED APPROPRIATELY TO ENSURE EASY IDENTIFICATION OF AND ACCESS TO THE POLLING PLACE.
4. No person shall be allowed to remain inside the 75 foot limit while the polls are open except for the purposes of voting and except for the election board and any officially appointed representatives. A.R.S. §16-515
5. It is unlawful for any person to electioneer on Election Day within a polling place or in a public manner within 75 feet of the main entrance of a polling place. Electioneering is any action or publication displayed for or against a candidate or a proposition on the ballot. A.R.S. §16-1018.1
6. Petition circulators, campaign workers, candidates, the news media, and any other person who is not voting must remain outside the 75 foot limit while the polls are open.
7. PLACE ALL HANDICAPPED PARKING SIGNS NEAR CURB CUTS SO THAT THE VOTERS WITH DISABILITIES HAVE EASY ACCESS TO THE CURB CUTS.

CLEARLY MARK THE PATH FROM THE HANDICAPPED PARKING TO THE POLLING PLACE.

USING THE SIGNS YOU HAVE POSTED AS A GUIDE, CAN A VOTER WITH DISABILITIES FIND THEIR WAY INTO THE POLLING PLACE THROUGH THE ENTRANCE FOR DISABLED PERSONS?

8. Open ~~only~~ 1 package of each ballot style to begin the election. Set-up the tables with the Signature Roster, Poll Lists and pens.

11. The Marshal announces the opening of the polls at 6:00 a.m. SHARPE

COMMON KNOWLEDGE

NO SMOKING PLEASE

No smoking by any person is allowed within the polling place.

Be sure to post the NO SMOKING signs and enforce this rule very firmly.

BOARD WORKER COURTESY

Board Workers should always maintain a peaceful and quiet atmosphere in the polling place. Remember, talking and other noises such as radios, televisions, etc. make it difficult for voters to concentrate. Do not accept food from outside the polling place.

PLEASE EAT YOUR FOOD DISCREETLY.

CELLULAR PHONES

CELLULAR PHONES ARE PERMITTED IN THE POLLING PLACE FOR LIMITED USE ONLY BY VOTERS AND POLL WORKERS.

00

CAMERAS

THE PUBLIC, MEDIA OR POLL WORKERS CANNOT BRING CAMERAS (VIDEO OR OTHERWISE) WITHIN THE 75 FOOT LIMIT WHILE THE POLLS ARE OPEN AND VOTERS ARE IN THE POLLING PLACE. (PURSUANT TO A.R.S. §16-818)

CHALLENGING A VOTER PROCEDURES

Please call Hotline for assistance, immediately upon Challenge.

The grounds for challenging voters are found in the Inspector's Bag, on the back side of the Challenge List Form. Don't make any entries unless a challenge is made. See A.R.S. §16-593 for rules determining the residence of a voter upon a challenge.

NOTE: A voter who has moved from one DISTRICT to another and who has NOT notified the County Recorder may vote a NEW RESIDENCE PROVISIONAL BALLOT in the District where his/her new address is located.

A majority of the voting members of the election board determines the validity of a challenge. The 2 Judges, together with the Inspector, make up the voting members of the election board. The oath is printed on the front side of the Challenge List Form.

No other affidavit is necessary. If a challenge is made, it's suggested the Inspector have the person challenged step aside and permit the other voters in line to continue to vote.

REMEMBER, CITIZENSHIP CANNOT BE CHALLENGED AT THE POLLS.

QUALIFIED ELECTORS DEFINED

Persons who may vote are:

1. Those electors whose names appear in the Signature Roster, either as Active or Inactive and have not moved from the address as listed. These electors vote by the standard voting procedures.

A list of INACTIVE VOTERS for each precinct has been compiled and placed in the back of the Signature Roster and each of the Precinct Registers. The list of INACTIVE VOTERS can be identified by the separator sheet & title at the top of the page.

If it is determined that the elector has moved from the address that is listed on the Signature Roster/Precinct Register, the elector will be directed to the Apache County Precinct Map to locate the precinct for the new address. The poll worker will find the appropriate polling place for the elector's new precinct and DIRECT the elector to the new polling place.

2. Those electors who surrender a County Recorder's Certificate authorizing the addition of their name to the Precinct Signatures Roster. The elector's names are added to the Signature Roster and they vote by the standard voting procedures. The register numbers for these voters will be the consecutive number after the last name listed in the active portion of the Signatures Roster.
3. Those electors who qualify to vote a Provisional. If an elector's name is NOT found on the Signature Roster, either in the Active or Inactive sections, check the Add-On List in the back of the Signature Roster. Be sure to check for possible misspellings or keying errors. Check the Alpha Listing to see if they are in Apache County but in another precinct.

If the person's name is NOT found and they have not moved or modified their voter registration record, then they shall be allowed to cast a Provisional Ballot.

If the person's name is NOT found and they do NOT have the VOTER RECEIPT copy of their registration and they are NOT currently registered in Apache County, then the poll worker will give the person a blank registration form to complete. Have the person complete the form and return it to the poll worker to be forwarded to the Elections Department in the envelope provided. That person must vote a provisional ballot at the current election.

4. Electors whose names were reported to the Inspector on the Early Ballot List, but who state to the election board that they did not vote, will not vote or are unable to vote their Early Ballot. Such electors will be allowed to vote by Provisional Ballot Procedure.

INACTIVE VOTERS

"If the notice sent by the recorder is not returned, the registrant may be required to provide affirmation or confirmation of the registrant's address in order to vote."

A.R.S. § 16-166(E)

If a voter is listed on the INACTIVE LIST, that voter must re-register.

VOTING PROCEDURES

This section will lay out step by step instructions for the Board Workers, telling you exactly what needs to be done from the time the voter walks in the door to the time he/she inserts their ballot into the Accu-Vote.

STANDARD VOTING PROCEDURE

Electors whose names appear on the Signature Roster or who submit a County Recorder's Certificate to the board will vote by the following procedure:

- 1) The voter reports to the Election Official assigned to the Signature Roster and announces their full name and address. Be sure to check address as well, if the voter lives at a different address they will need to report to the Provisional Ballot (BTV) Tables for processing.

- a. The election official locates the voter's name in the Signature Roster, either in the list of regular (Active) voters, the list of Inactive Voters or Add-ons and verifies that the address is correct by asking the voter their address.
 - b. The election official asks the voter to sign the signature block next to their name. The election official tells the Poll List Clerk the voter's Register Number.
- 2) The Poll List Clerk locates the voter's name in the Precinct Register and enters the voter's name and Register Number on the next available line of the Poll List. USE A BALL POINT PEN. Call out the voter's Register Number to the Judge issuing ballots.
 - a. Please PRESS HARD. The Register Number for an Inactive Voter is preceded with the letter "I".
 - b. USE ONLY ONE (1) POLL LIST AT A TIME.
 - 3) The Judge looks up the voter by Register Number in the Precinct Register.
 - a. The Judge selects the proper ballot and gives it to the voter. Secrecy folders should be used for all voters.
 - b. Explain that a special black ballot marking pen must be used. Reminding the voter that they must fill in the oval entirely.
 - c. Explain that ballots that are damaged or mis-marked must be spoiled and a replacement ballot will be issued. LIMIT 3.
 - d. Explain how the ballot is inserted into the Accu-Vote, by the Voter.
 - e. Explain how to do a write-in, remember that the voter must write the candidate's name AND fill in the oval.
 - f. Be sure to remind the voter to vote BOTH sides of the ballot, if applicable.
 - 4) The voter enters a voting booth and marks the ballot with the special black ballot marking pen. The pen is left in the booth. Periodically, check the booths and make sure that each has a special black ballot marking pen.
 - a. After voting, the voter puts the official ballot in the secrecy folder and goes to the Accu-Vote.
 - b. The voter REMOVES the official ballot from the secrecy folder and inserts the ballot into the Accu-Vote. The ballot can be inserted in the Accu-Vote in any direction. The voter gives the secrecy folder to the election official.

- c. THE ELECTION OFFICIAL SHOULD STAND TO THE SIDE OR BACK OF THE ACCU-VOTE. THE BALLOT IS SECRET.
- d. DO NOT INSERT THE BALLOT IN THE ACCU-VOTE FOR THE VOTER unless the voter asks you for assistance.

A VOTER DOES NOT HAVE TO VOTE FOR EACH AND EVERY CANDIDATE OR ISSUE ON THE BALLOT. THIS IS CALLED UNDER VOTING. THE ACCU-VOTE DOES NOT REJECT A BALLOT BECAUSE OF AN UNDER VOTE. EVEN IF A VOTER HAS BEEN GRANTED POWER OF ATTORNEY, THEY CANNOT VOTE ON BEHALF OF THAT VOTER.

SPOILED

SPOILED BALLOTS

1. If a voter makes a mistake on the ballot, it may be exchanged for another. No more than 3 ballots may be issued to one voter. Remember, on Early Ballot counts for 11
2. The word "SPOILED" is written across both sides of the ballot by the voter. The Inspector, Judge & Voter MUST SIGN the Spoiled ballot. If the voter wishes, the election official may write the word "SPOILED" across both sides of the ballot.
3. The Spoiled ballot must be placed in the Official Envelope Immediately. You may want to put a secrecy folder in the Official Envelope to protect the secrecy of any ballots. Removes the folder after the polls have closed.
4. The election official shall look up the voter's name in the Precinct Register, select the correct ballot and issue it to the voter.

DO NOT PUT SPOILED BALLOTS INTO THE BLACK BALLOT BOX. THEY MUST GO INTO THE OFFICIAL ENVELOPE IMMEDIATELY.

THE VOTER MAY HAVE ONLY ONE BALLOT IN THEIR POSSESSION AT A TIME.

NEVER PRESS 'YES' TO OVERRIDE AND ACCEPT A VOTER'S BALLOT WITHOUT THE VOTER'S PERMISSION.

A JAMMED BALLOT MUST BE REMOVED FROM THE ACCU-VOTE UNIT BUT NOT IF IT HAS FALLEN INTO THE BLACK BOX. DO NOT GET OUT OF THE BLACK BOX, JUST MAKE A NOTE ON THE TAPE THAT THIS HAPPENED. INDICATED IF IT WAS COUNTED OR NOT.

OVERVOTED BALLOT

If a voter has voted for more candidates than are to be elected to an office, the Accu-Vote will reject the ballot and return it to the voter. The message "OVERVOTED BALLOT" and the office that was overvoted will print on the tape. THE ELECTION OFFICIAL MUST READ THE MESSAGE ON THE TAPE. The voter can do the following:

1. The ballot can be spoiled. If the voter wants to spoil the ballot, the words "SPOILED" must be written on both sides of the ballot & signed by Inspector, Judge & Voter.
2. The ballot will be spoiled and a replacement ballot issued to the voter. The voter should go back into the voting booth to vote the replacement ballot. During this time, let other voters continue to vote. KEEP THE LINE AT THE ACCU-VOTE MOVING!
3. If the voter refused to vote a replacement ballot and at the request of the voter, the election official can press "YES" button and the ballot will be accepted.

UNVOTED BLANK BALLOT

If a voter has inserted an "unvoted" blank ballot into the Accu-Vote, the Accu-Vote will return the ballot. The message, "UNVOTED BLANK BALLOT" will print on the tape. The voter can do the following:

1. If the ballot was simply mis-marked the voter can vote that ballot. The ballot can be given to the voter with instructions to return to the voting booth to mark the ballot. During this time, other voters continue to insert their ballots into the Accu-Vote.
2. At the request of the voter, if the voter intentionally voted a blank ballot, the election official can press the "YES" button and the Accu-Vote will accept the ballot.
3. A voter cannot use white-out, cross out or erase on a ballot.
4. IF THE VOTER MARKS THE BALLOT OUTSIDE THE OVAL, THE BALLOT MUST BE RE-MARKED CORRECTLY, STAYING WITHIN THE OVAL, AS SHOWN ON THE INSTRUCTIONS IN THE VOTING BOOTH.

MISREAD BALLOTS

If a ballot is misread, meaning that for some reason the Accu-Vote is not able to process the ballot, the Accu-Vote will return the ballot. A message will print on the tape. A misread ballot can be one of the following:

1. A damaged ballot.
2. Misprinted ballot.
3. Voter marked ballot in the heading.
4. Incorrect ballot—ballot from another precinct.
5. Voter inserts ballot into wrong Accu-Vote in a co-located polling place.

- > A misread ballot should be spotted and a replacement ballot issued.
- > If the voter will not vote a replacement ballot, have the voter drop the ballot in the side slot of the Ballot Box.

- > DO NOT USE THE "YES" TO OVERRIDE". The Accu-Vote will not accept a second ballot.
- > BE SURE TO INSTRUCT THE VOTER THAT THE MISREAD BALLOT WILL BE TABULATED AT ELECTION CENTRAL LATER THAT NIGHT.

PROVISIONAL BALLOT (BALLOT TO BE VERIFIED) PROCEDURE

There are 4 different situations for issuing a Provisional Ballot (formerly known as Ballot To Be Verified):

- a. The voter's name does not appear on the Signature Roster.
- b. The voter has moved within the precinct. (New Residence Ballot)
- c. The voter has moved outside of the precinct. (New Residence ballot)
the voter must go to their new polling place to vote.
- d. The voter has requested or received an early Ballot and did not bring the Early Ballot to the polling place for voting.

VERIFICATION PROCEDURE FOR ISSUING OF THE PROVISIONAL BALLOT

(IF THE VOTER IS WILLING TO ATTEST TO THE FACT THAT THEY HAVE LIVED WITHIN A JURISDICTION FOR MORE THAN 29 DAYS, THEY WILL BE ALLOWED TO VOTE A PROVISIONAL BALLOT IN THAT JURISDICTIONS ELECTION.)

1) VOTER'S NAME DOES NOT APPEAR IN SIGNATURE ROSTER

- a. If the voter's name is not on the regular (active) list of voters, the inactive list of voter's or the Add-On List, the voter should produce the Voters Receipt copy from their registration form or a Voter I.D. Card.
- b. The election official shall find the voter's address on the precinct map. Make sure the voter lives within the boundaries of this precinct.
- c. The election official shall complete the Provisional Ballot form. Two election officials and the voter must sign the form.
- d. If the voter has a Voter I.D. Card or Voter's Receipt, clip it to the outside of the envelope. DO NOT PUT IT INSIDE THE ENVELOPE.
- e. Give the envelope to the voter and ask the voter to return to the Signature Roster.

- f. On the PROVISIONAL BALLOTS page of the back of the Signature Roster, the election official enters the voter's name and other identifying data as shown in the Signature Roster. These voters are assigned register numbers beginning with V-1, V-2, etc. A voter's name is added to the Signature Roster ONLY if the voter's name is NOT on the Signature Roster.
- g. The voter signs the signature block next to their name. The election official tells the Poll List Clerk the voter's Register Number.
- h. The Clerk fills out the Poll List. USE ONLY A BLACK PEN.
- i. The Judge looks up the voter in the Precinct Register and selects the proper ballot.
- j. The Judge puts the ballot in a Secrecy Folder and gives it to the voter.
- k. The voter enters a voting booth and marks the ballot with the special black ballot marking pen. DO NOT USE FELT PENS!!!
- l. After voting the voter puts the ballot in the Provisional Envelope and closes and seals the envelope.

THE VOTER SHALL INSERT THE PROVISIONAL BALLOT INTO THE SIDE SLOT OF THE BLACK BALLOT BOX. DO NOT PUT INTO ACQU-VOTE.

2) VOTER HAS MOVED WITHIN YOUR VOTING PRECINCT

- a. If the voter's name is on the Signature Roster, but the voter has moved.
- b. Verify the location of the new residence address on the precinct map.
- c. The election official shall find the voter's address on the precinct map. Make sure the voter lives within the boundaries of this voting precinct.
- d. The election official shall complete the Provisional Form. Two election officials and the voter must sign the form.
- e. Attach the form to the manila envelope provided. Give the envelope to the voter and ask the voter to return to the Signature Roster.
- f. The voter signs the signature block next to the voter's name. The election official tells the Poll List Clerk the voter's Register Number. DO NOT ADD THE VOTER'S NAME TO THE ROSTER. IT IS ALREADY THERE.
- g. The Clerk fills out the Poll List using a black ball point pen.
- h. The Judge looks up the voter in the Precinct Register and selects the proper ballot.
- i. The Judge puts the ballot in a Secrecy Folder and gives it to the voter.
- j. The voter enters a voting booth and marks the ballot with the special black ballot marking pen.

- k. The voter puts the ballot in the manila envelope and closes and SEALS the envelope.
- l. THE VOTER SHALL INSERT THE PROVISIONAL BALLOT IN THE SIDE SLOT OF THE BLACK BALLOT BOX.

3) THE VOTER HAS MOVED TO A NEW VOTING PRECINCT

- a. If the voter's name is in the Signature Roster, but the voter has moved to a residence address located in another voting precinct, direct the voter to the precinct map.
- b. The election official, in cooperation with the voter, will locate the voter's new residence address on the Precinct Map.
- c. The election official shall look up the address of the polling place on the Alpha List and direct the voter to go to the new polling place to vote a Provisional Ballot.

IF THE VOTER IS ALLOWED TO VOTE A PROVISIONAL BALLOT IN THE WRONG PRECINCT, THE BALLOT WILL NOT COUNT.

4) THE VOTER REQUESTED AN EARLY BALLOT

These voters will be indicated in the Signature Roster with a RED EV in the box next to their name.

- a) The election official shall complete the Provisional Ballot Form. Two election officials and the voter must sign the form.
- b) Attach the form to the manila envelope provided. Give the envelope to the voter and ask the voter to return to the Signature Roster.
- c) The voter signs the signature block next to the voter's name. The election official tells the Poll List Clerk the voter's Register Number. DO NOT ADD THE VOTER'S NAME TO THE ROSTER. IT IS ALREADY THERE.
- d) The Clerk fills out the Poll List in Red Ink.
 - i. USE A RED BALL POINT PEN.
- e) The Judge looks up the voter in the Precinct Register and selects the proper ballot.
- f) The Judge puts the ballot in a Secrecy Folder and gives it to the voter.
- g) The voter enters the voting booth and marks the ballot with the special black ballot marking pen.

h) The voter folds the ballot in half and puts it in the envelope and closes and SEALS the envelope.

i) THE VOTER SHALL INSERT THE BALLOT ENVELOPE INTO THE SIDE SLOT OF THE BLACK BALLOT BOX.

EARLY BALLOTS DELIVERED TO YOUR POLLING PLACE

VOTED EARLY BALLOTS CAN BE DROPPED OFF AT ANY POLLING PLACE BY 7:00 P.M. ON ELECTION DAY.

IF A VOTER SHOWS UP WITH AN EARLY BALLOT TO "SURRENDER", UNLESS THERE IS SOMETHING WRONG WITH THE BALLOT THE VOTER SHALL DO THE FOLLOWING:

- ✓ GO TO A BOOTH AND VOTE THE BALLOT WITH THE SPECIAL MARKING PEN.
- ✓ SIGN AND DATE THE BALLOT AFFIDAVIT ENVELOPE.
- ✓ FOLD AND PLACE THE VOTED BALLOT INTO THE ENVELOPE.
- ✓ SEAL THE ENVELOPE.
- ✓ INSERT THE ENVELOPE INTO THE SIDE SLOT OF THE BLACK BALLOT BOX.

IF THE VOTER HAS SPOILED THEIR EARLY BALLOT, THEY MUST VOTE A PROVISIONAL BALLOT AT THEIR ASSIGNED POLLING PLACE.

NEVER ISSUE A REPLACEMENT BALLOT TO BE USED WITH AN EARLY BALLOT PACKET.

29

SAFETY IN THE POLLING PLACE

It is up to the Marshal or designee to see that reasonable safety precautions are taken in a polling place during Election Day. Reasonable precautions should include, but are not limited to the following:

> Voter traffic ways are clear of debris

> Extension cords are out of the way

> Chairs are behind tables or off to the side

> Electrical appliances are out of the way of voter traffic flow and out of the reach of small children

Electrical appliances, such as coffee pot, will be allowed in the polling place for the use of board workers ONLY WITH PRIOR APPROVAL OF THE FACILITY'S OWNER/MANAGER.

ANY ACCIDENT OR INJURY IN A POLLING PLACE REQUIRING EMERGENCY TREATMENT SHALL BE REPORTED IMMEDIATELY TO THE 9-1-1 EMERGENCY NUMBER. ALSO, REPORT ANY ACCIDENT OR INJURY BY CALLING THE HOTLINE #.

COMMON COURTESIES AND GUIDELINES FOR VOTERS WITH SPECIAL

NEEDS

- Be considerate of the extra time it might take for a person who is disabled or elderly to get things done.
- Speak directly to the person who has a disability rather than to a companion who may come along.
- Speak calmly, slowly and directly to a person with a hearing problem. Don't shout.
- Before pushing someone in a wheelchair, ask if you may do so and how you should proceed.
- Greet a person who is visually impaired by letting the person know who and where you are.
- Be aware that dogs which assist people with disabilities should be admitted into the polling place. These dogs are highly trained and need no special care.
- Remember that all voters deserve courteous attention in exercising their rights as citizens to vote.

USE PLENTY OF SIGNS TO INDICATE THE WAY TO THE DISABLED VOTERS

ENTRANCE INTO THE POLLING PLACE ONE WAY

ASSISTANCE TO VOTERS

- Any voter may, at their option, be accompanied and assisted by a person of their choice or shall be assisted by 2 election officials (DEM & REP).
- If the election officials assist the voter, they shall distinctly state to the voter the names of all candidates for each office or the written description of the ballot measures and shall ask the voter how they wish to vote in each instance.
- The election officials shall then mark the ballot indicating the voter's choices.

- Neither of the election officers who assist you with your vote are allowed to influence your vote by recommending or suggesting any candidate or political party for any office.

VOTERS WITH DISABILITIES (CURBSIDE VOTING)

The Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 establishes guidelines for the accessibility of facilities to the disabled community. Where accessibility for voters with disabilities is not achievable, the Secretary of State has established an alternate voting procedure.

For precincts determined to be less accessible, a sign notifying any disabled voters of the alternative method for voting is included in the precinct supplies. Post sign near the disabled parking signs in the parking lot. THIS IS A CURBSIDE VOTING AVAILABLE SIGN.

- o The disabled voter should relay a message through a companion, or other nearby person, to the precinct election board that he/she wishes to vote.
- o The Marshal verifies the voter's registration on the Signature Roster and enters the voter's registration information from the roster onto a Disabled Voter Signature Affidavit found in the precinct supplies on a clipboard.
- o The Inspector directs 2 board workers (DEM & REP) to proceed to the voter's vehicle with an official ballot, special black ballot marking pen and secrecy folder. The voter signs the affidavit, votes the ballot and places it in the secrecy folder.
- o The 2 board workers return to the voting area and present the ballot to the election official of the Accu-Vote. The election official removes the ballot from the Secrecy Folder and puts the ballot into the Accu-Vote. The board workers give the Disabled Voter Affidavit to the election official at the Signature Roster, who puts it in the back of the roster, and enters "DISABLED VOTER" in the signature block next to the voter's name. The Clerk enters the voter's name into the Poll List.

CLOSING THE POLLS

The closing of the polls is announced by the Marshal at 1 hour, at 30 minutes, at 15 minutes, at 1 minute before, and at the moment of closing, which is 7:00 p.m. ALL ELIGIBLE VOTERS IN THE LINE AT 7:00 P.M. WILL BE ALLOWED TO VOTE.

AFTER THE LAST PERSON HAS VOTED, ANYONE CAN OBSERVE THE CLOSING OF THE POLLS. PICTURES CAN BE TAKEN AS LONG AS THERE ARENT ANY CLOSE-UPS. THE PUBLIC CANNOT INTERFERE WITH THE CLOSING PROCESS.

After the last person has voted:

- Open the door on the top of the Accu-Vote with the gold key. While pressing the "YES" and "NO" buttons, insert the Yellow Ender Card. This officially ends the election and a results tape will print.
- Print 2 copies of the results tape. The Inspector and the Judge sign the bottom of the tape.
- While the results tape is printing, remove the ballots from the Black Ballot Box.
- Using the Ballot Map, begin to sort the various ballots and complete the Ballot Report (found in the Poll List)
- All of the voted ballots, including the Provisional and Early ballots are placed in the Black Ballot Bag and secured with the Blue Seal. (DO NOT SEAL UNTIL ALL ITEMS ON THE BALLOT BAG CHECKLIST ARE INSIDE THE BAG)
- ONLY THE ITEMS LISTED ON THE OFFICIAL AND UNOFFICIAL ENVELOPE CHECKLIST SHOULD GO INSIDE THEM.

- PUT THE OFFICIAL SEAL ON THE OFFICIAL ENVELOPE ONLY.
- Put the unused ballots in a box (if they were sent in a separate box, if not they go into the Blue Supply Box).
- All other supplies should be returned to the Blue Supply Box and locked.
- Unlock the front door of the Black Ballot Box holding the Accu-Vote machine.
- Plug in the phone cord to the back of the Accu-Vote in preparation for the transmitting of the results.

- Take to the phone to the designated transmitting location. Plug jack in.
- The message on the digital readout will ask if you want to transmit results. Press "YES". It will sound like an Internet connection.
- It should send within 2-3 tries.
- When the results are sent, you may turn off the Accu-Vote.
- The Accu-Vote and Black Ballot Bag will be transferred to the St. Johns Election Office by the Troubleshooter.
- All other equipment will be picked up by another truck.
- PLACE THE KEY RING WITH ALL KEYS IN THE SIDE POCKET OF THE BLACK ACCU-VOTE BAG. DO NOT PUT THEM IN THE UNOFFICIAL OR OFFICIAL ENVELOPE.
 - ✓ Make sure that everyone has signed the Payroll Voucher!!
 - ✓ Leave the polling place in better condition than you found it. Remove all trash and loose papers.
 - ✓ Turn out the lights, turn off the a/c or heating and lock the door before you leave the polling place.

TIME TO GO HOME!!

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

This glossary is a work in process. Its production is the result of the concerted efforts, deep concerns and devoted attention of many, many people. Unfortunately, at this point in time, a truly comprehensive or fully accurate acknowledgement is not possible. It is the hope that all involved with this vital and evolving effort appreciate the importance and magnitude of this document. The improvement of knowledge regarding the voting rights of Navajo language speaking citizens will provide a lasting and true acknowledgement to all who worked to make this glossary possible.

Finally, no acknowledgement for the work on this project would be just or complete without a special mention of the contributions of Mr. Harold Noble. His work on this project, spanning aspects from actual translation work to recruiting translators to coordinating the efforts of contributors, has been a driving force in bringing this document to its current high quality and wide acceptance. This would have been a much lesser document, but for his leadership and wisdom.

SAMPLE BALLOT -OVERRIDE ELECTION

SPECIAL ELECTION

Window Rock Unified School District No. 8
Apache County, Arizona - May 17, 2005

The Governing Board and the Window Rock Unified School District #8 are requesting:

- Approval to exceed the 2005-06 Maintenance and Operations Budget in the amount of $1,473,237, an amount not to exceed 10% (ten percent) of the Revenue Control Limit for the year for which adopted and for six (6) subsequent years.
- Approval to exceed the 2005-06 Maintenance and Operations Budget for Kindergarten through Third Grade in the amount of $514,819, an amount not to exceed 5% (five percent) of the Revenue Control Limit for the year for which adopted and for six (6) subsequent years.

Any budget increase authorized by this election shall be entirely funded by this school district with revenues from other than levy of taxes on the taxable property within the school district for the year for which adopted, and for six (6) subsequent years and shall not be realized from monies furnished by the state. In fiscal years 2011-2012 and 2012-2013 the amount of the proposed increase will be six and two-thirds percent and three and one-third percent, respectively, of the District's revenue control limit in each of such years, as provided in Section 15-481(P) of the Arizona Revised Statutes.

If the proposed budget is disapproved, the alternate budget shall be adopted by the school district governing board.

The total amount of the 2004-05 adopted budgets for Maintenance and Operations is $23,809,835, and for Kindergarten through Third Grade is $495,526.00. The total amount of the proposed budget for Maintenance and Operations is projected to be $20,523,492, and for Kindergarten through Third Grade is $514,819. The total amount of the alternate budget for Maintenance and Operations is $19,086,255, and for Kindergarten through Third Grade is $0.

Based on the estimated Secondary Total Net Assessed Value of $11,304,158, no owner-occupied residence (class 5) or business (class 3) will experience an increase in their tax bill.

A Message from the Apache County Elections Director:

As a result of Arizona voters passing Proposition 200, known as Identification at the Polls, it is now necessary to provide Identification at the Polls the next time you cast your vote. This means that you will be required to present proper ID at the polling place. The information included on the identification must reasonably appear to be the same as the information on the signature roster. The following types of identification will be accepted:

Acceptable forms of identification with photograph, name, and address of the elector

- Valid Arizona driver license
- Valid Arizona non-operating identification license
- Tribal enrollment card or other form of tribal identification
- Valid United States federal, state, or local government issued identification

An identification is "valid" unless it can be determined on its face that it has expired.

IT IS NOT MANDATORY TO OBTAIN A PHOTO ID. YOU MAY BRING ONE OF THE FOLLOWING FORMS OF ID:

Acceptable forms of identification without a photograph that bear the name and address of the elector (two required)

- Utility bill of the elector that is dated within ninety days of the date of the election. A utility bill may be for electric, gas, water, solid waste, sewer, telephone, cellular phone, or cable television
- Bank or credit union statement that is dated within ninety days of the date of the election
- Valid Arizona Vehicle Registration
- Indian census card
- Property tax statement of the elector's residence
- Tribal enrollment card or other form of tribal identification
- Vehicle insurance card
- Recorder's Certificate
- Valid United States federal, state, or local government issued identification, including a voter registration card issued by the county recorder

An identification is "valid" unless it can be determined on its face that it has expired.

IF YOU DO NOT HAVE THE PROPER ID, YOU WILL BE ABLE TO VOTE A PROVISIONAL BALLOT.
ALL VOTERS WILL RECEIVE A BALLOT WHEN GOING TO THE POLLING PLACE.

For questions call the Apache County Elections Director, Penny L. Pew at (800) 355-4368, ext. 7537 or (928) 337-7537 or send an email to ppew@co.apache.az.us or www.co.apache.az.us

IT IS NOT MANDATORY TO OBTAIN A PHOTO ID. YOU MAY BRING TWO OF THE FOLLOWING FORMS OF ID:

Acceptable forms of identification without a photograph that bear the name and address of the elector (two required)

- Utility bill of the elector that is dated within ninety days of the date of the election. A utility bill may be for electric, gas, water, solid waste, sewer, telephone, cellular phone, or cable television
- Bank or credit union statement that is dated within ninety days of the date of the election
- Valid Arizona Vehicle Registration
- Indian census card
- Property tax statement of the elector's residence
- Tribal enrollment card or other form of tribal identification
- Vehicle insurance card
- Recorder's Certificate
- Valid United States federal, state, or local government issued identification, including a voter registration card issued by the county recorder

An identification is "valid" unless it can be determined on its face that it has expired.

IF YOU DO NOT HAVE THE PROPER ID, YOU WILL BE ABLE TO VOTE A PROVISIONAL BALLOT. ALL VOTERS WILL RECEIVE A BALLOT WHEN GOING TO THE POLLING PLACE.

For questions call the Apache County Elections Director, Penny L. Pew at (800) 355-4368, ext. 7537 or (928) 337-7537 or send an email to ppew@co.apache.az.us or www.co.apache.az.us

POLLS OPEN 6AM - 7 PM TUESDAY, NOV. 8, 2005

A Message from the Apache County Elections Director:

As a result of Arizona voters passing Proposition 200, known as Identification at the Polls, it is now necessary to provide identification at the Polls the next time you cast your vote. This means that you will be required to present proper ID at the polling place. The information included on the identification must reasonably appear to be the same as the information on the signature roster. The following types of identification will be accepted:

Acceptable forms of identification with photograph, name, and address of the elector

- Valid Arizona driver license
- Valid Arizona non-operating identification license
- Tribal enrollment card or other form of tribal identification
- Valid United States federal, state, or local government issued identification

An identification is "valid" unless it can be determined on its face that it has expired.

Un Mensaje de la Directora de Elecciones del Condado Apache

Como consecuencia de la aprobación de la Proposición 200 por los votantes de Arizona, conocida como Identificación en los Centros Electorales, será necesario presentar identificación en los Centros Electorales la siguiente vez que se presente para votar. Esto significa que será necesario presentar identificación aceptable en el centro electoral. La información contenida en la identificación tiene que razonablemente ser igual a la información que aparece en el registro de firmas. Los siguientes tipos de identificación se aceptarán:

Prueba de identificación aceptable con una fotografía, nombre, y dirección particular del elector.

- Licencia de manejar de Arizona válida
- Licencia de identificación no de manejar de Arizona válida
- Tarjeta de inscripción tribal u otro tipo de identificación tribal
- Identificación suministrada por el gobierno de los Estados Unidos, federal, estatal o local válida

Una forma de identificación es "válida" a menos que se determine que la información se ha vencido.

NO ES OBLIGATORIO OBTENER IDENTIFICACIÓN CON UNA FOTOGRAFÍA. SE PERMITE PRESENTAR DOS DE LOS SIGUIENTES TIPOS DE IDENTIFICACIÓN:

Prueba de identificación sin una fotografía aceptable con el nombre, y dirección particular del elector (se requieren dos tipos)

- Cuenta de empresa pública del elector con un fecha dentro de noventa días de la fecha de la elección. La cuenta de empresa pública puede ser de electricidad, gas, agua, desperdicios sólidos, alcantarillado, teléfono, teléfono celular, o televisión por cable.
- Estado de cuenta del banco o cooperativa de crédito con un fecha dentro de noventa días de la fecha de la elección.
- Registro de Vehículo de Arizona Válido
- Tarjeta de censo de Indio
- Declaración de impuestos sobre la propiedad de la residencia del elector
- Tarjeta de matriculación tribal u otro tipo de identificación tribal
- Tarjeta de seguros de vehículo
- Certificado de la Registradora
- Identificación suministrada por el gobierno de los Estados Unidos, federal, estatal o local válida, incluyendo una tarjeta de votante inserta emitida por la registradora del condado.

Una forma de identificación es "válida" a menos que se determine que la información se ha vencido.

SI NO PRESENTA IDENTIFICACIÓN ACEPTABLE, SE LE PERMITIRÁ VOTAR UNA BOLETA PROVISIONAL. AL PRESENTARSE EN EL CENTRO ELECTORAL TODOS LOS VOTANTES RECIBIRÁN UNA BOLETA

Si tiene preguntas comuníquese con la Directora de Elecciones del Condado Apache, Penny L. Few al (800)355-4368, extensión 7537 o (928) 337-7537 o envíe un correo electrónico a ppew@co.apache.ar.us o www.co.apache.ar.us

What is the Presidential Preference Election?

When is the Presidential Preference Election?

A.R.S. § 16-241 (B)

Governor Napolitano issued a proclamation (order) that the 2004 Presidential Preference Election shall be held on February 3, 2004.

What Other Elections Will Appear On The Ballot In February?

A.R.S. § 16-241 (A)

No other election may appear on the same ballot as the Presidential Preference Election.

Will The Candidates Be Listed In Alphabetical Order?

A.R.S. § 16-245 (B)

The order of the names of certified candidates shall be determined by lots drawn at a public meeting called by the secretary of state for that purpose.

Rotation of candidate names is prohibited.

What Is The Presidential Preference Election?

A.R.S. § 16-243

All candidates for the Office of President of the U.S. will appear on the ballot in February. There will be separate ballots for each recognized political party.

The candidate who receives the greatest number of votes in the Presidential Preference Election will represent the party at the National Convention.

Will I Receive A Sample Ballot?

A.R.S. § 16-245 (D,E)

The officer in charge of elections shall mail one sample ballot to each party represented on the Presidential Preference Election ballot to each household that contains a registered voter of that political party.

The mailing face of each sample ballot shall be imprinted with the great seal of the State of Arizona with the words "official voting materials---presidential preference election."

Can I Vote?

You must be registered with one of the recognized political parties in Arizona who have a candidate on the ballot. Voters with no party preference will not be able to vote in this election.

Where Do I Go To Vote?

If you live on the Navajo Nation, you will vote where you usually vote in County and State elections.

If you live off-reservation, there will be consolidation of some polling places. Eagar & Round Valley will vote at the Round Valley Gymnasium. Springerville & Flat Top will vote at the Apache County Road Yard. St. Johns & Coronado will vote at the County Annex. All other polling places will remain the same.

A.R.S. § 16-246 Early Ballots

Beginning Nov. 6, 2003, you may request an Early Ballot be mailed to you for the Presidential Preference Election. Ballots will be mailed out on Jan. 19, 2004. Early Voting ends on Jan. 30, 2004.

To request an Early Ballot, call (800) 361-4402.

To vote in the Presidential Preference Election, you must be registered with the Political Party for whom you are casting a vote.

The deadline to register to vote in the Presidential Preference Election is Jan. 5, 2004.

APPENDIX TO THE STATEMENT OF PENNY PEW: PREPARED STATEMENT OF PENNY PEW
SUBMITTED TO THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

I requested some information from Kimmeth Yazzie, Navajo Nation language contact, who writes the following statement:

The purpose of the minority language consent decrees has generated a much greater cooperation and assistance to provide the necessary election and voter registration services to the Navajo Nation within the counties, much more than what was anticipated from the beginning. Although the consent decree specific to Apache County expired in 1992, the county and the Navajo Nation continue to strive forward to this day to make voter registration and election easier for the citizens on Apache County. Such services as siting outreach offices and Navajo speaking personnel in local areas with additional personnel when it becomes necessary has made voting easier for the people of Apache County. An example, the development of the Navajo Glossary has opened doors to better communication with the Navajo Nation citizens as well as other tribes seeking development of the same methods of outreach. Developments of graphic materials and video and audio recordings provide our people with a better understanding of the elections. Bringing voter registration to the local area eliminates the long distance travels just to register to vote for out outlying areas. Setting up and coordinating events together with the Navajo Nation and the county provides voters with two services at one location and a better understanding of the two distinctive elections. The clearance of all materials and information through the Navajo Election Administration provides assurance to the Navajo Nation that the proper and sufficient election information is provided to the people of the Navajo Nation, thus developing trust and alliance. Ideas to better provide services are always being exchanged between the county and the Navajo Nation. We learn from each others. Since the expiration of the consent decree in 1992, the relationship between the tribe and the county has grown and advanced beyond the bounds of the consent decree requirements.

In closing, I can honestly say that the language program has been positive for our county in educating and promoting our most fundamental right...the power of our vote.

Introduction

Discrimination in voting is as old as voter registration. Throughout the years, laws and procedures have been used to keep people from voting. During the same time, laws have been on the books to battle discriminatory attempts to keep people off voter registration rolls. Some of these anti-discrimination laws have been effective, but many have not.

Beginning with the Fifteenth Amendment, [EN1] ratified on February 3, 1870, to the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and its amendments in 1970, 1975, 1982 and 1992, [EN2] the United States Congress has passed laws to prevent acts that disenfranchised minority group members. Also during this period other laws were enacted under Congress' power in Article I, Section 4, of the U.S. Constitution [EN3] and the Fourteenth Amendment [EN4] to authorize legal action *402 against practices and procedures that disenfranchised U.S. citizens. [EN5]

The authors have worked for over thirty years to fight against unjust voting procedures. Others recently have declared their readiness to join in the fight in view of the events surrounding the Presidential election in November 2000, which lent a new immediacy to concerns about the actions that prevent legitimate voters from casting their ballot, or having their ballot counted. Studies, reports, and other analyses have been produced to lament the fate of these voters, and to recommend various remedies for the problems that are found. But there are several basic points that need to be stressed in pursuing this analysis, and they can be boiled down to the following:

- Bad things happen in polling places;
- There are steps that have effectively stopped the bad things from happening in polling places;
- There are particular steps that can be taken now to stop bad things from happening in polling places;
- The states already have all the authority they need to administer elections fairly and effectively;

- The states should stop making excuses and start fulfilling their responsibility for administering elections effectively;
- If the states cannot figure out where the problems are, the federal government should do so;
- States and the federal government need to make the financial commitment necessary to administer fair elections.

In this article we will review the antecedents to the present federal civil rights voting laws and the circumstances that led to the legislation. Then, we will explain the use of federal observers under the Voting Rights Act to monitor and report on the treatment of voters in polling places. Next, we will discuss actions the states can take and have taken to stop voter mistreatment that prevents the casting of effective ballots on election day. This includes on the spot corrections on election day, and gathering facts that will allow corrections to be made for future elections. Finally, we will show actions the federal government can take if states do not stop the mistreatment of voters, and the authority for taking that action.

*403 I. Before the Voting Rights Act of 1965

A. Disenfranchisement Was Direct And Hard to Stop

It has been noted that voter registration procedures were first instituted to erect hurdles that made it difficult for people to become voters. [FN6] Most famously, voter registration requirements adopted after the Civil War kept thousands of African-American people from registering to vote. From laws that allowed only white people to register to vote, to laws that were neutral on their face but discriminatorily applied, the number of African-Americans on the voting rolls was kept to a minimum.

Ultimately, in Guinn v. United States, [FN7] the U.S. Supreme Court found unconstitutional a 1910 amendment to the Oklahoma constitution that required literacy tests of all applicants for voter registration, but exempted everyone who was eligible to vote on January 1, 1866, and all of their lineal descendants. Since the Fifteenth Amendment became effective in 1870, and African-Americans were unable to register to vote before then, the 1910 amendment allowed all white males to avoid taking the literacy test, while requiring all African-American voter applicants to take it. Laws that insulate persons from a new requirement based on preexisting characteristics, which those persons have or get from their antecedents, are called grandfather clauses. A grandfather clause in a subsequent Oklahoma statute disallowed voter registration to everyone qualified to vote in 1916, but who neither voted in 1914, nor registered to vote during a two-week period in 1916. Those excepted from the application of the law were individuals who registered in 1914, a time when African-Americans could not register to vote because of the provision condemned in the Guinn case. The new Oklahoma statute was eventually held to be an unconstitutional infringement of the Fifteenth Amendment in Lane v. Wilson. [FN8]

Similarly, when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Texas could not limit the franchise to white people in Nixon v. Herndon, [FN9] that state abandoned its white-only law for general elections, but attempted to remove the state from involvement in political party candidate selection. When that scheme was found unconstitutional in Smith v. Allwright, [FN10] the Texas Democratic Party delegated its authority for candidate selection to a "whites-only" club, arguing that an election to nominate a political party's candidate for office is private action, not state action, and therefore the party can legally include or exclude whoever it wants from voting in the election. This scheme, too, was found *404 unconstitutional under the Fifteenth Amendment in Terry v. Adams. [FN11] During the pendency of these cases state laws effectively kept African-Americans from voting in Texas for decades.

Other laws that were neutral were as effective as "whites-only" laws in keeping African-Americans off of the voting rolls, but were found equally unlawful. The poll tax, adopted by Alabama during its 1901 Constitutional convention, and intended to keep blacks from voting, worked. [FN12] Literacy tests also precluded applicants from registering if they failed to demonstrate their literacy by reading and/or writing particular matters, such as portions of the state constitution. These tests allowed county voter registrars to arbitrarily keep African-Americans off of the voting rolls. [FN13]

As state laws were found to unconstitutionally bar African-Americans from voter registration, states adopted new tests to apply to voter applicants. When Louisiana adopted new voter registration standards, white people who were registered under the less stringent earlier standards were allowed to remain on the voting rolls. All the while, African-Americans, who had been kept off of the voting rolls until then, underwent testing to become registered. Although new white applicants were also required to meet the new standards, there was a racially discrepant impact of the scheme. The Supreme Court did not allow such racially unfair circumstances to continue. [FN14]

B. An Initial Federal Remedy for Disenfranchised Voters

In response to the paucity of practices and procedures that effectively disenfranchised African-American voters, federal civil rights voting laws were included in the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960 and 1964, and codified at 42 U.S.C. § 1971 et seq. Taken together, these laws include additional language prohibiting racial discrimination in voting, [FN15] authorize the U.S. Attorney General to file lawsuits to enjoin racial discrimination in voting, [FN16] and contain administrative and judicial procedures that may be used to stop harassment of newly enfranchised African-American voters at the polls. These procedures marked Congress's initial attempt to breach the wall of federalism, dictating that it is the function of the states, and the states alone, to determine voter qualifications. [FN17] Because of a strong resistance to federal *405 intervention in state functions, the procedures adopted by Congress to fight the discriminatory application of literacy tests were ponderous and required continuing participation by the courts. [FN18]

These procedures were not effective in dealing with the problem of the discriminatory application of literacy tests to thousands of individuals throughout the South. Lawsuits required proof that white Southern county registrars, nearly all who conducted voter registration and elections along with other tasks, unfairly administered the state's literacy test to black applicants. [FN19]

To assemble such proof, U.S. Department of Justice ("DOJ") lawyers conducted investigations in each county in the Southern states that may have been at fault. At a county courthouse, lawyers, accompanied by F.B.I. agents microfilmed each voter registration application form--thousands in all. Lawyers and paralegals then reviewed each form to record whether the applicant was white or black (a W had been marked by the registrar on the application forms of white people, and a C, for colored, had been marked on the forms of African-Americans), and to record the applicant's education, the reason the applicant failed the test, and other relevant information. Nearly all rejected applicants were African-American.

Reasons for application rejection ranged from an inability to explain constitutional provisions, to an indistinct period after the applicant's middle initial. A number of African-American applicants who were rejected were college graduates, some with advanced degrees. It was common for the county registrar to complete applications in neat handwriting for white people who passed literacy tests, but allowed the applicant to sign with his or her own nearly illegible, shaky scribbles. Moreover, the clear evidence of the arbitrary rejection of African-American voter applicants as shown by the registration forms still required bolstering by other documentation and witnesses. [FN20]

*406 Given such an arduous task, and the continued inability of the legal system to anticipate the discriminatory actions of voter registrars when applying voter registration requirements, African-American citizens continued to be excluded from the rolls of registered voters throughout the South.

[R]egistration of voting-age Negroes in Alabama rose only from 14.2% to 19.4% between 1958 and 1964; in Louisiana it barely inched ahead from 31.7% to 31.8% between 1956 and 1965; and in Mississippi it increased only from 4.4% to 6.4% between 1954 and 1964. In each instance, registration of voting-age whites ran roughly 50 percentage points or more ahead of Negro registration. [FN21]

In addition, each time litigation was successful in enjoining one kind of discriminatory procedure, the state or the county would adopt another kind of discriminatory procedure that was equally effective in keeping African-Americans off of the voter rolls. Against this backdrop and the well-publicized efforts of civil rights workers helping southern African-Americans to register to vote, the beatings of African-American marchers on their way out of Selma, Alabama, heading to rally for voting rights on the steps of the state capital of Montgomery, Alabama, in March 1965, galvanized the nation and led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 in August.

II. The Voting Rights Act of 1965

A. The Special Provisions of the Voting Rights Act

Congress found that case-by-case litigation was inadequate to combat widespread and persistent discrimination in voting because of the inordinate amount of time and energy required to overcome the obstructionist tactics invariably encountered in these lawsuits. After enduring nearly a century of systematic resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress might well decide to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victims. [FN22]

The Voting Rights Act (the "Act") cut through the protective barrier of federalism with two important sections. Section 5 of the Act (the "preclearance" provision) required federal review of any new voting procedure states and counties might adopt. [FN23] This prohibited the adoption of new discriminatory practices when a jurisdiction's present practices were found to be unlawful. Section 4 of the Act instantly led to the enfranchisement of thousands of people by suspending the use of literacy tests and similar discriminatorily applied barriers to the registration of *407 African-Americans in the deep south. [FN24] Some states, such as Virginia, immediately stopped using literacy tests. In other southern states, federal examiners were appointed under Section 6 of the Act [FN25] and were assigned to counties to conduct fair voter registration under Section 7 of the Act. [FN26] when white county officials refused to stop their racially discriminatory voter registration practices. [FN27] This was no small task, as over 170,000 people were registered between 1965 and 1972 through the efforts of the federal examiners, mostly in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi. [FN28]

Further, in order to allow the U.S. Attorney General to know whether discriminatory action was taken against the newly enfranchised voters in the polling places on election day, Section 8 of the Act allowed that, whenever an examiner has been appointed:

the Director of Personnel Management may assign, at the request of the Attorney General, one or more persons, who may be officers of the United States, (1) to enter and attend at any place for holding an election . . . for the purpose of observing whether persons who are entitled to vote are being permitted to vote, and (2) to enter and attend at any place for tabulating the votes cast at any election . . . for the purpose of observing whether votes cast by persons entitled to vote are being properly tabulated. [FN29] *408 Thus, the use of federal observers in polling places initially aimed to protect the rights of new voters who were registered by federal examiners. Although federal voter registration became rare after 1972, the predicate under the Voting Rights Act for assigning federal observers has not changed: federal observers continue to be allowed only in counties that are certified by the U.S. Attorney General for federal examiners. [FN30] As a result, to allow the assignment of federal observers to a county, the county has been certified by the U.S. Attorney General or a federal court for federal examiners. [FN31] The assignment of federal observers continues to be a cornerstone of the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act. Over 23,000 federal observers have been assigned to monitor polling place procedures since 1966 and over 4,393 since 1990 alone. [FN32]

B. Racial Discrimination at the Polls

Federal observers were able to note and document a wide variety of discriminatory actions that were taken against African-Americans in the polls. Some of these insulting and direct actions are reflected in the United States' responses to interrogatories in U.S. v. Conecuh County. [FN33]

While providing assistance to a black voter, white poll official Albrecht asked, "Do you want to vote for white or niggers?" The voter stated that he wanted to give everyone a fair chance. Albrecht proceeded to point out the black candidates and, with respect to one white candidate, stated, "This is who the blacks are voting for." Poll official Albrecht made further reference to black citizens as "niggers" in the presence of federal observers, including a statement that "niggers don't have principle enough to vote and they shouldn't be allowed. The government lets them do anything." [FN34]

*409 White poll workers treated African-American voters very differently from the respectful, helpful way in which they treated white voters. When questions arose about the voter registration data for a white person, such as a person's address or date of registration, or when a white person's name was not immediately found on the poll books, the voter was addressed as Mr. or Mrs., was treated with respect, and the matter was resolved on the spot. If the voter's name was not found, often he or she either was allowed to vote anyway, with his or her name added to the poll book, or alternately, the person was allowed to vote a provisional or challenged ballot, which would be counted later if the person were found to be properly registered. If, however, the voter was black, the voter was addressed by his or her first name and either sent away from the polls without voting, or told to stand aside until the white people in line voted. African-American voters were not allowed to take sample ballots into the polls and were made to vote without those aids. [FN35]

African-American voters who were unable to read and write, due in large part to inferior segregated schools and the need to go to work in the fields at an early age, were refused their request to have someone help them mark their ballot, notwithstanding the Voting Rights Act's bar on literacy tests. In some instances, white poll workers loudly announced the African-American voter's inability to read or write, embarrassing the voter in front of his or her neighbors. When black voters said they could not see the ballot well, some white poll workers went so far as to give a magnifying glass to the African-American voters, challenging them to read using the magnifying glass in front of everyone present at the polling place. Illiterate white voters, on the other hand, were allowed assistance by a person of their choice without comment. Routinely, white couples were allowed to enter the voting booth together to mark their ballots.

In those instances where African-American voters had an assistor in the booth, arbitrary rules were concocted that limited the number of voters an assistor could help, or made the assistor wait outside the polling place, requiring the voter to enter the polls alone and negotiate alone the sign-in procedures administered by unfriendly white poll workers, before being allowed to ask that the assistor be allowed to help. [FN36] All too often, when the voter said he or she needed assistance the white poll worker proceeded to help the voter, and did not give the voter a chance to ask for the assistor the #410 voter wanted, the voter did not know if the poll worker cast the ballot as the voter desired, and had no confidence that the ballot was correctly cast.

Racial discrimination in the polls is neither limited to African-Americans, nor limited to the south. On November 2, 1999, in the City of Hamtramck, Michigan, the qualifications of more than 40 voters were challenged on grounds that they were not citizens. The challengers were members of a group known as Citizens for a Better Hamtramck ("CCBH"), who were organized to keep elections pure. As described in the Consent Order and Decree in U.S. v. City of Hamtramck: [FN37]

6. . . . Some voters were challenged before they signed their applications to vote. Other voters were challenged after they had signed their applications and their names had been announced. The challenged voters had dark skin and distinctly Arabic names, such as Mohamed, Ahmed, and Ali. The challengers did not appear to possess or consult any papers or lists to determine whom to challenge.

7. Once challenged, the city election inspectors required the challenged voters to swear that they were American citizens before permitting them to vote. Voters who were not challenged were not required to do so. The city election inspectors did not evaluate the propriety or merit of the challenges. Some dark-skinned voters produced their American passports to identify themselves to election officials. Nevertheless, these persons were challenged by CCBH, and the election inspectors required them to take a citizenship oath as a prerequisite to voting. No white voters were challenged for citizenship. No white voters were required to take a citizenship oath prior to voting. [FN38]

The consent decree also states that city officials were apprised of the incidents, that they consulted with state election officials who were present in Hamtramck on election day, but neither the state nor the city election officials prevented the baseless challenges from continuing. It was claimed that other Arab-American citizens may have heard about the incidents and decided not to go to the polls to vote that day.

C. Discrimination Against Language Minority Group Members at the Polls

Besides discriminatory treatment of citizens based on race, citizens who speak English poorly, or not at all, have faced obstacles to voter registration and voting. In 1975, Congress took note of discrimination against people who have only a limited ability to speak English. For them, printing or providing information only in English is effective as a literacy test in keeping them from registering to vote or casting an effective ballot. Such disenfranchisement was outlawed when the Voting Rights Act was amended and expanded in 1975. The terms of Section 4 of the Act, containing the formula for applying special coverage to counties, were changed to include #411 among prohibited tests and devices:

the practice or requirement by which any State or political subdivision provided any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance or other material or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, only in the English language, where the Director of the Census determines that more than five percent of the citizens of voting age residing in such State or political subdivision are members of a single language minority. [FN39]

Language minorities are defined in the Voting Rights Act as American-Indian, Asian-American, Alaskan-Natives, and people of Spanish heritage. [FN40] Usually, political subdivisions as defined in the Act are counties. [FN41] The 1975 amendments to the Act required that when a newly covered jurisdiction

. . . provides any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, it shall provide them in the language of the applicable language minority group as well as in the English language. . . . [FN42]

Counties in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah were certified for federal examiners, and federal observers were assigned to document the extent to which the English language was used in areas where many of the voters spoke Native-American languages but understood English only marginally. Similarly, federal observers have been assigned to polling places in

Spanish language areas of Arizona, Texas, New Jersey and New York City, and Chinese language areas of New York City, and San Francisco and Oakland, California. [FN43] In all these areas minority language citizens were allowed to *412 register to vote, but the use of the English language instead of the voters' first language prevented them from understanding the voting instructions and the ballot. Polling place workers either were not able to speak the language of the voters, or if they could, were not trained to translate the documents and procedures into the language of the voters. By the 1990s federal observers were assigned to monitor discrimination against language minority group members in numbers equal to the federal observers assigned to monitor non-language racial discrimination. [FN44]

The need for the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act continues to be demonstrated in areas of the country where English is not persons' primary language. Normally one would assume that polling place workers would be chosen from the population where the polling place is located, and that they would speak another language in addition to English with the same frequency as the voters. In many instances, however, this did not happen. For example, in ethnically changing neighborhoods in New York City, the choices of the political party apparatus resulted in the repeated appointment of English-speaking poll workers where a large portion of the new voters in a precinct were Spanish-speaking Puerto Ricans. In Passaic, New Jersey, English-speaking poll workers were unable to find the names of Spanish-speaking voters in the polls books because the poll workers did not know that the voters' family name traditionally was the second of three names they used. Some voters were denied the ballot because they identified their street name according to common Spanish usage rather than the formal English name. [FN45] In Texas and southern Arizona polling places Hispanic voters were admonished not to use Spanish when talking in the polling places and when giving assistance to voters who needed help when voting. Moreover, the citizenship of Hispanic voters was questioned at the polls, with voters being required to somehow provide on-the-spot evidence of their citizenship before being given a ballot, such evidence was not required of Anglo voters. [FN46]

Evidence of other kinds of discriminatory behavior of polling place workers and others toward Spanish language voters inside the polls is provided in the reports of the Independent Elections Monitor appointed in *413 September 2000 by the court in a consent decree in U.S. v. Passaic City. [FN47]

At P.S. 6, observers called to report that the challenger was making racist remarks about Hispanics. At the Ukrainian school, challengers became very aggressive and were yelling at voters, stating that they did not live in the country and should not vote. Ironically, many of these challenged voters were off-duty Passaic City police officers. Angel Casabona, Jr. was one such challenged police officer who avoided confrontation and properly came to Passaic City Hall to have his voting status clarified. Escorted by the City Clerk and investigators from the prosecutor's office, Mr. Casabona reentered the polling site and was permitted to exercise his vote. The brazen challenger was reprimanded and board workers were reminded that challengers should not be interacting with voters. [FN48]

The most disturbing incident of the June 26, 2001 municipal primary election occurred at the polling place at St. Mary's School in Passaic. Someone allegedly stole the flag from outside the polling place. The police were called. An officer responded and caught the purported perpetrator. The Officer entered the polling place and asked who had called the police. No one responded. The officer barked comments in substance to the poll workers as follows, "Can't you read? What country do you come from?" When a municipal worker of Indian origin came to see what the problem was, the officer then asked, "And what country do you come from?" When a Latino federal observer tried to explain the dictates of the consent decree, the officer asked for credentials. When the observer showed his credentials, the officer found them inadequate because they lacked a picture and detained the observer. The Officer told the observer, "I could arrest you for this." Upon being alerted to the controversy, I asked investigators from the Passaic County Prosecutors Office and Deputy Chief of the Passaic County Police Department to intercede. When a Sergeant from the Passaic Police department responded at the scene and learned what had happened, he apologized to the federal observer and told him he thought some sensitivity training might be in order for the officer. Notably, this discriminatory behavior took place in a city where the Latino population is at 62 percent. Intolerance in the city is still existent and hiding under color of official right. [FN49]

The use of English rather than Chinese in polling places in Chinese neighborhoods of San Francisco and Oakland (Alameda County), California, and New York City left voters confused about procedures, and ignorant of ballot propositions and contested offices. As was noted in the Settlement Agreement and Order in U.S. v. Alameda County:

*414 According to the 1990 Census, the population of Alameda County includes 68,184 Chinese Americans and 30,120 Chinese American citizens of voting age. The 1990 Census reports that 11,394 persons, or 37.83 percent of the Chinese citizen voting age population in Alameda County, and 1.3 percent of the total citizen voting age population in Alameda County do not speak English well enough to participate effectively in English language elections. Thus, over 11,000 Chinese American citizens in Alameda County cannot function effectively in the electoral process except in the Chinese language. [FN50]

Problems were also severe in Native-American areas of Arizona, New Mexico and Utah. The problems faced by Native-Americans in these areas are illustrated in Cibola County, New Mexico, which contains the Ramah Chapter of the Navajo Reservation and the Acoma and Laguna Pueblos. The Stipulation and Order in U.S. v. Cibola County [FN51] states that:

5. According to the 1990 Census, 57.8 percent of the Navajo voting age population and 18.1 percent of the Pueblo voting age population in Cibola County do not speak English well enough to participate effectively in English language elections. Thus, a significant proportion of the Native-American population of Cibola County, and a significant majority of Navajos, cannot function in the electoral process except in the Navajo or Keresan languages. [FN52]

6. The Navajo and Keres populations of Cibola County live in circumstances of significant isolation from the non-Native-American populations of the county. Cibola County is unusually large in physical terms and covers a geographic area roughly the size of the State of Connecticut. Over four-fifths of the non-Native-American population lives clustered within or near the adjacent incorporated communities of Grants and Milan, close to the county courthouse. The Acoma and Laguna population centers are between 25 and 50 miles away from Grants, the county seat, while the Ramah Chapter House is approximately 50 miles from Grants. The isolation of the Native-American population of Cibola County burdens their access to the franchise.

8. Native-American citizens living within Cibola County, suffer from a history of discrimination touching their right to register, to vote, and otherwise to participate in the political process. Until 1948, Native-American citizens of New Mexico were not permitted to vote in state and local elections. [FN53] In 1984, the court in Sanchez v. King held that the New Mexico state legislative redistricting plan discriminated against Native-Americans. [FN54]

9. The level of political participation by Native-American citizens of Cibola County is depressed. Voter registration rates in the *415 predominantly Native-American precincts have been less than half the rate in non-Native-American precincts, and Native-Americans are affected disproportionately by voter purge procedures. Although Native-Americans comprise over 38 percent of the county population, fewer than eight percent of all absentee ballots have been from the predominantly Native-American precincts. There is a need for election information in the Navajo and Keresan languages, and a need for publicity concerning all phases of the election process for voters in Ramah, Acoma and Laguna. The rate of participation by Native-Americans on such issues is less than one third of the participation rate among non-Native-Americans. There is a need for polling places staffed with trained translators conveniently situated for the Native-American population. [FN55]

The remedy for this unlawful disparity is complicated by the facts that (1) the Navajo and Pueblo languages are oral, not written, and (2) there are no equivalent terms in the Navajo and Pueblo languages for many words and phrases in the election process.

Native-American polling place workers in reservation precincts faced a more difficult task than white poll workers in getting to the training session for poll workers that were held many miles away in county seats where most white people lived. At the training sessions Native-American poll workers were given little or no instruction about how to translate ballots and propositions, and many of their attempts to do so on election day resulted in the most rudimentary references. For example, poll workers assisting voters at the polls would refer to the office of secretary of state as someone who works in the state capitol, and bond levies for education were said simply to be increases in taxes. Many times the Native-American poll workers found it so difficult to figure out how to explain items on the ballot they just instructed the voters to skip the offices or propositions. Moreover, Native-American voters who had been purged from the voter rolls because they failed to respond to written notices they either did not receive [FN56] or did not understand, were turned away from the polls with no explanation of why they were not able to vote, and were given no opportunity to re-register there. [FN57]

*416 III. How To Find Out Where Unjust or Discriminatory Poll Procedures Will Happen: The Federal Observer Model

A. The Three-Step Pre-election Investigation

The task of assuring compliance by polling place workers with appropriate polling place procedures requires (1) knowledge of what is happening in the polling places, and (2) the authority to correct actions that are in violation of the prescribed procedures. For over thirty-five years the DOJ has determined, before each election, what will happen in specific polling places in particular counties in states far from Washington, D.C. Based on this information DOJ determined at which polling places discriminatory activity would take place, and the exact number of federal observers needed at each particular polling place, from among the hundreds of counties in the sixteen states that are fully or partially covered under Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act, [FN58] and the ten additional jurisdictions in other states that have been and remain certified by courts

under Section 3 of the Act. [EN52]

This DOJ effort, known as a pre-election survey, is conducted by the Voting Section of DOJ's Civil Rights Division. Pre-election surveys began right after the Voting Rights Act was enacted, as a tool for determining where and how many federal observers would need to be assigned under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act. Through the years the pre-election surveys have remained relatively unchanged for determining where racially discriminatory actions (as contrasted with language-based difficulties) would occur in the polling places of the deep south. This process is instructive on a broad level because it can be used, with variations, by states throughout the country to determine, prior to election day, where problems will occur on election day in polling places across the state.

The DOJ focus during the pre-election surveys is to find circumstances that are likely to lead to actions that will disadvantage voters in the polls on election day. To allow black voters to vote without interference in the South, the Voting Section focuses on counties where black candidates are facing white candidates, especially where political control of the governing body is at stake. Those are the circumstances where experience has shown that *417 polling place workers are more apt to take actions that deprive African-Americans of their right to vote. Moreover, the inclination of polling place workers to take discriminatory action against African-American voters is more likely when the black candidates have a real chance of beating white opponents. (For concerns about other kinds of problems at the polls, the pre-election survey would focus on the facts and antipathies relating to those problems).

The surveys begin about six weeks before the election, which is a time when candidate qualifying has been completed and campaigning has been in progress. The Voting Section contacts county election directors to determine a number of facts, including the name and race of the candidates, the office each is contesting, which candidates are incumbents, the county's procedures for appointing polling place workers, and the county's procedures for responding to problems that arise on election day. Telephone calls are also made to African-American people in each county who are familiar with the way elections have been conducted in the county during recent elections, who know who the candidates are and how the candidates have been conducting their campaigns, and who are knowledgeable about relationships between the races in the county and whether there have been any recent racial incidents in the county.

Often, on-site information is necessary to decide whether federal observers are needed. Voting Section attorneys then travel to the counties where the facts show that poll workers will make it difficult for black voters to cast their ballots for the candidates of their choice. The attorneys interview the county election officials, the county sheriff (or chief of police, if a city election is in issue), African-American county residents, including people associated with community and civil rights organizations, and candidates. Thus, the attorneys get sufficient information to make their recommendation to Voting Section supervisors as to whether federal observers should be assigned for the election, and, if so, the number and placement of federal observers that will be needed on election day. [FN60] The polling places that are selected for the assignment of observers are those at which (1) the facts show that African-American voters are likely to be mistreated or misled on election day, and where (2) the county has no effective way to either know what is happening in the polls, or for responding to problems that occur at the polls, or both.

During the pre-election surveys the Voting Section supervising attorney talks frequently with the Voting Rights Coordinator at the Office of Personnel Management ("OPM") who recruits and supervises the people who serve as observers. [FN61] Thus, OPM is aware of the identity of the counties *418 that are the subject of field investigations, and of the recommendations of the attorneys for the assignments, numbers and poll locations of federal observers. Because of the ongoing coordination between the Voting Section and OPM, the federal observers are chosen by OPM and are ready to depart for their assigned location the moment a final decision is made by the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights as to the numbers and placement of the observers. [FN62]

B. Federal Observers on Election Day

The pre-election process not only gives DOJ information it needs to determine where and how many federal observers will be needed on election day, it puts DOJ lawyers in contact with county election officials before the election, and the DOJ lawyers inform the county officials of the problems that DOJ found may occur in the county's polls on election day. This contact continues during the election, as the DOJ lawyers provide the county election officials with information the lawyers get from the observers.

The observers are briefed by DOJ attorneys and the observer captain on the day before the election. The observers have pre-printed forms on which to record the activity in the polls. Observers often attend the ballot count and record the number of votes received by each candidate. A federal observer report form can be found at Appendix E.

During election day an observer supervisor repeatedly visits the polling places where federal observers are stationed. This supervisor remains in constant telephone contact with the DOJ attorney in the county. This gives the DOJ attorney in the county a constant flow of information throughout the day about activities that transpire inside the polls. [FN65] When the federal *419 observers inform the DOJ attorney of actions of polling place officials that the attorney concludes are interfering with the voting rights of African-Americans, the DOJ attorney gives the facts to the local official in charge of the election to stop the discriminatory activity. Local officials may also use this information after the election to take steps to prevent the incidents from happening again.

Similar steps are taken on election day when federal observers are used to determine compliance with the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act. The pre-election preparation is different, however because an inability or lack of desire of poll workers to provide information to non-English speaking voters does not usually depend on the identity of the candidates or the issues involved in a particular election. The information obtained in one election about language minority procedures will determine whether federal observers are needed in the next election. [FN61]

The reports of federal observers have primary emphasis on the language aspects of polling place procedures and the actions of polling place workers. [FN65] A federal observer report form used for language minority elections can be found at Appendix F. Usually, it is neither required that the observers arrive at the opening of the polls, nor that they stay all day. The goal is to have the observers attend the polls long enough to witness a number of minority language voters go through the voting process. This will give the observers sufficient facts to allow the DOJ attorneys to analyze the county's compliance with the law.

We should emphasize that federal observers do not interfere with the election process. Their limited function, to pass along information to their OPM supervisors and the DOJ attorneys, is in accord with the dictates of Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act. [FN66] The observers must not give instructions to poll workers, must not give help to voters, and must not share their observations, judgments or opinions with individuals in the polls. They are eyes and ears. They are paid witnesses.

IV. Requiring Counties to do Their Job

In its enforcement of all federal civil rights laws the DOJ attempts to obtain voluntary compliance from prospective defendants. This has been especially true when enforcing the Voting Rights Act because the prospective defendants are officials of state and local governments.

*420 From the beginning of DOJ's enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, DOJ lawyers personally conducted investigations in each county before examiners or observers were assigned and regularly checked on the progress of examiners while voter registration was conducted. On election day, a DOJ attorney continues to be present in each county to which federal observers are assigned. The DOJ attorney obtains information from the observers during election day and debriefs the observers immediately after the election. During their presence in the counties, the DOJ lawyers have continuous contact with county officials to give them the information gained from their pre-election investigation in the county and from the federal observers. Those local officials have the opportunity to instruct the head worker at the polling place to follow the appropriate procedures. The federal observers inside the polling place witness the cessation of the discriminatory action, or if the discriminatory action continues, the DOJ lawyer again brings the information from the observers to the attention of the county election official to attempt to get corrective action. Thus, federal observers gather evidence of discriminatory activities in the polling place for future legal action, and serve to eliminate discriminatory action on the spot. At times, the mere presence of federal observers at the polls simply prevents the tendency of polling place workers to discriminate against minority voters.

A. Court-ordered Remedies Require Counties To Do Their Job in the South

Some compulsive action is needed when county election administrators do not address outstanding problems in the polls, and do not follow proper election day procedures. A primary reason for the mistreatment of African-American voters was and continues to be the failure of local election officials to appoint African-Americans as polling place workers. The evidence of mistreatment that this discriminatory policy had on African-American voters provided a firm basis for court orders requiring defendants to take specific steps to recruit and hire African-Americans to work in the polls. One good example of this result is the consent decree in U.S. v. Conecuh County. [FN62] The decree required the defendant political party executive committees (responsible for nominating people to serve as poll workers) to "engage in affirmative recruitment efforts aimed at ensuring that the pool of persons from which nominations are made fully reflects the availability of all qualified persons in Conecuh County who are interested in serving as election officials, without regard to their race or color." [FN63]

Those recruitment efforts were required to include encouraging candidates to "seek out and propose for nomination black citizens," and sending notices to local organizations comprised predominantly of black citizens . . . to advise them that the party intends to nominate persons to serve as election officials and encourage them to have interested persons notify the chairperson of the respective political party executive committee "of their willingness to serve as election officials." [FN64]

A 1993 consent order in U.S. v. Johnson County stated that:

1. According to the 1990 Census, the total population in Johnson County is 34 percent black and the total voting age population is 29.2 percent black.

7. Of the one hundred thirty one individuals who were employed by Johnson County to serve as poll officials between 1988 and August 1992, eighteen (14%) were black. There were no black poll workers during this period at seven of the twelve polling places.

8. Only eight (12%) of the sixty-six poll officials employed by Johnson County for the July 21, 1992 primary election were black. There were no black poll workers at eight of the twelve polling places.

9. Of the one hundred and six poll officials employed by Johnson County for the November 3, 1992 general election, only sixteen (15%) were black. There were no black poll workers at six of the twelve polling places.

10. No black person has ever served as a managing poll officer or an assistant managing poll officer at any of the county's polling places. [FN71]

Included in the Johnson County consent decree among the steps the defendant county commission and supervisor of election must take to have African-Americans fairly represented among the polling place workers are, "[s]ending written notices to local organizations comprised predominantly of black citizens . . . to advise them that the county intends to appoint black persons to serve as poll workers and poll managers;" and "[c]ontacting black candidates and members of the political parties . . . to ascertain the names, addresses and telephone numbers of black citizens who are qualified and available to serve as poll officers." [FN71] In addition, the defendants must publicize in local newspapers, on radio, on television and on posters their policy of conducting elections free of racial discrimination. They also must train the poll workers on how to perform their duties in a racially nondiscriminatory manner, and, with specificity, on how to deal with voters who need assistance.

Even with the specific steps set out in the fifteen page Johnson County consent decree, the reports of federal observers showed that African-American citizens of Johnson County were continuing to be excluded from among the ranks of those appointed to work at the polls because the supervisor of elections did not adhere to the terms of the decree. After further discussions between the county and DOJ, in lieu of DOJ pursuing contempt of court proceedings the county appointed a biracial committee "422 formed of county residents to perform the preliminary poll worker recruitment and nomination functions previously performed by the election supervisor, leaving her with her statutory duty of formally appointing the poll workers." [FN72] As a result, African-Americans were fairly appointed among those who worked at the polls, and discrimination against African-American voters at the polls abated in Johnson County, Georgia, in immediately subsequent elections.

Both the Conecuh County and Johnson County cases show how information gathered by observers can serve as the evidentiary basis for litigation, how particular individuals at the county level can persist in discriminatory procedures despite state law and federal litigation, and how the identity and training of the people working inside the polling places is of primary importance in eliminating injustice from the polls. It should be remembered that in both instances the DOJ lawyers first shared their information with state and local election officials in an attempt to allow those officials to eliminate the discriminatory treatment of voters. These efforts provided the election officials with something they could obtain by themselves, i.e., information about what went wrong in their polls. The need for the resulting litigation demonstrated that those officials were not willing to stop the discriminatory conduct.

B. Court-ordered Remedies Require Counties To Do Their Jobs for Language Minorities

Even after the Voting Rights Act was amended in 1975 to require that areas designated under a formula must provide information and ballots in languages other than English, inadequate training of polling place workers continued to disadvantage minority language voters. The reports of federal observers gave the attorneys from the Department of Justice the information they needed to prove to county officials that violations of the Voting Rights Act had occurred, and to obtain consent decrees that set out specific steps that the counties would take to effectively provide and translate election information to Native-American citizens.

Most of the consent decrees to cure discriminatory actions in Indian country under the language minority provisions of Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act [FN72] set out in detail the procedures that election officials had to follow for voter education, voter registration, translation and balloting. [FN74] It is significant that the great majority of the provisions in the consent decrees focused on the counties' administrative responsibilities, including hiring *423 additional county personnel, to try to give Native-American voters equivalent access to information about an election and voting procedures as white people received as a matter of course, because all information was provided in English and in areas near the county seats.

Thus, the Stipulation and Order in U.S. v. Cibola County is forty-four pages long, thirty-three pages of which is a Native-American Election Information Program. [FN75] This program provides that, "Cibola County shall employ at least three Native-American Voting Rights Coordinators who will coordinate the Native-American Election Information Program in Cibola County . . ." These coordinators have to be bilingual in either Navajo or Keres and English, they are to be hired only after the county consults with the tribes, they are to be trained in all aspects of the election process, they are to attend and make presentations at chapter and tribal council meetings, and perform numerous, specifically described functions that would provide election information to the Native-American citizens of Cibola County.

It was and remains difficult, however, to compel obdurate county clerks and other county election administrators to perform the myriad election-connected functions in a way that meets the requirements of the court orders. These cases argue persuasively for continuing the practice of seeking detailed court orders that can be enforced through contempt proceedings. [FN76]

An alternative approach was taken in a consent decree between DOJ and Bernalillo County, New Mexico, where the court order was accompanied by, but did not incorporate, a manual containing procedures to be followed in order to comply with the language minority requirements of the Voting Rights Act. [FN77] The consent decree required that the county hire a native language coordinator who is bilingual in Navajo and English, and specifically noted that, "[t]he primary responsibility of the [native language coordinator], a full-time employee of Bernalillo County, shall be to carry out the county's Navajo language election procedures, publicity and assistance, including assisting the county to carry out the procedures in the manual . . ." [FN78] The consent decree also required the county to establish a travel, supply, and telephone bill budget for the native language coordinator, [FN79] and subjected the county to the preclearance provision in Section 3(c) of the Voting Rights *424 Act, [FN80] which allows the county to make changes in the manual and for DOJ to review those changes to determine that they are nondiscriminatory before they can be implemented. [FN81] This approach has the benefit of allowing the county to tailor its administrative procedures to its particular personnel and office situation, and of allowing practical changes to be made in the administrative procedures when necessary without having to request the three-judge court for an amendment to the court order.

V. State Laws Governing Irregularities, Interference and Intimidation At Polling Places

Each state has established laws and regulations that govern the conduct of elections within the state. These include laws establishing the location of polling places, conduct of elections, methods of getting on the ballot, composition and printing of the ballot, appointment of officials overseeing the conduct of the election, selection and training of poll workers, qualifications of voters, and absentee voting. Many of these laws were intended to ensure that voters may freely exercise their right to vote.

A. Poll Watchers

Most state laws give the candidate or political parties the power to observe behavior in the polling places. These are the people who choose the polling place watchers, and they have the power to refuse to rehire watchers who do not properly apply state polling place procedures. Thus, the law of New York says:

At any general, special, town or village election, any party committee or independent body whose candidates are upon the ballot, and at any primary election, any two or more candidates and any political committee may have for each election district three watchers at any one time . . . Watchers shall be appointed by the chairman of any such party, committee or independent body or by the candidates. [FN82] Similarly, Utah law says:

For each regular general election or statewide special election, and for each regular primary . . . each registered political party and any person interested in a ballot proposition appearing on the ballot may appoint one person to act as a voting poll watcher to observe the casting of ballots, another person to act as a counting poll watcher to observe the counting of the ballots, and another person to act as an inspecting poll watcher to inspect the condition and observe the securing of ballot packages. [FN83] *425 Though poll watchers are on hand during elections, state laws do not routinely give state-level officials the authority to take action, apart from the authority to prosecute officials for malfeasance, if county or municipal election officials refuse to take steps that will assure fair treatment of voters at the polls. At most, state level officials are empowered to gain information about activity in the polling place that can serve as the basis for action after the election.

B. Prohibiting Intimidation and Interference

In addition to prescribing routine election procedures, most states have laws that prohibit intimidation of voters or interference with their ability to freely exercise their right to vote. Some state laws have broad prohibitions against interference with or intimidation of voters at any time. Other states only prevent interference with or intimidation of voters in entering and exiting the polling place. Others only prohibit interference with election officials in the exercise of their duties and are silent with respect to voter intimidation. [FN84] While penalties for violations of most voter intimidation statutes are misdemeanors under state laws, some are felonies. [FN85]

In addition to providing criminal penalties, a few states have created other statutory means for dealing with voter intimidation, such as creating special civil causes of action or providing special remedies such as invalidation of elections. For example, Tennessee Code Annotated Section 2-3-108 allows invalidation of an election based on violation of statutory provisions against intimidation. [FN86] Delaware law creates a specific civil cause of action for those who are victims of intimidation or attempted intimidation. [FN87]

*426 While most states have at least some statutes designed to protect voters from interference or intimidation, only a few state laws provide specific statutory means for dealing with voter intimidation or interference while it is happening. For example, Nebraska and Washington allow certain specified officials to take actions, including arrest, to clear entrances and exits from polling places when obstructed. [FN88]

South Carolina and Virginia specifically confer special authority on election officials to take action to enforce state laws against voter intimidation or interference of a broader nature than physically blocking access to polling places. South Carolina law grants police powers to managers of elections. [FN89] Virginia law permits election officers to order the arrest of persons under certain circumstances. [FN90] Wisconsin law requires municipal clerks and election inspectors to prevent interference with voters at the polls, but does not provide how they are to do so. [FN91] These state provisions are unusual in that they specifically authorize election officials to take action to stop voter intimidation or interference at the time they occur.

While very few states allow intervention at the polling place, there are some states that provide a mechanism for gathering information after bad things at polling places occur, similar to those mechanisms under the federal civil rights laws. Take the laws of Illinois and Georgia, for example, which permit an official in the Secretary of State's or Attorney General's office or the appropriate county's district attorney's office to take direct action regarding activity that occurs in the polling places, but only after the action has occurred. In Illinois, the State Board of Elections may review and inspect procedures and records relating to the conduct of elections and voter registration as may be deemed necessary, and report violations of elections laws to the appropriate State's Attorney. [FN92] In Georgia:

*427 It shall be the duty of the State Election Board . . . to investigate, or authorize the Secretary of State to investigate, when necessary or advisable, the administration of primary and election laws and frauds and irregularities in primaries and elections and to report violations of the primary and election laws either to the Attorney General or the appropriate district attorney who shall be responsible for further investigation and prosecution . . . [FN93]

History, however, is not on the side of broadening the investigation powers of state actors. For, historically, state actors have been part of the problem at polling places and not the solution. This is especially a dilemma in legislating against voter intimidation and interference.

C. Law Enforcement—Problem or Solution

There are state laws that recognize this problem and specifically prohibit law enforcement officials from engaging in intimidation or appearing within a certain distance of polling places. Pennsylvania law provides that: "In no event may any police officer unlawfully use or practice any intimidation, threats, force or violence nor, in any manner, unduly influence or overawe any elector or prevent him from voting or restrain his freedom of choice, nor may any such police officer electioneer or directly or indirectly attempt to influence the election or electors while within one hundred feet of a polling place." [FN94] South Carolina limits the presence of police officers only to those summoned by election managers to enforce their orders. "No sheriff, deputy sheriff, policeman or other officers shall be allowed to come within the polling place except to vote unless summoned into it by a majority of the managers." [FN95] There are other states that, while not prohibiting law enforcement officers from being present at polling places, specifically prohibit acting under color of authority to intimidate or interfere with voters. [FN96]

VI. Problems That Allegedly Occurred in Polling Places On Election Day November 7, 2000

Determination of the optimum means of ensuring the right of all citizens to freely cast their votes without interference or intimidation depends on the ability to identify what the problems are and fashion an appropriate remedy. Some problems can be dealt with on election day at the polling place, while others may require investigation and action after the fact. But the key is to establish appropriate systems to gather the information as has been done at the federal level in places covered by the Voting Rights Act.

The 2000 presidential election focused perhaps the greatest attention ever on the election process in the United States. Numerous organizations conducted investigations and issued reports on what happened at the polls on November 7, 2000. [FN97] Some of these inquiries were broader than a review of what happened in Florida. While historically there has been some public awareness of problems at the polls in the United States, many members of the public were shocked to discover that, in fact, every ballot cast for president is not necessarily counted and that problems at the polls are not limited to certain areas of the country where there are minority groups. In the past, to the extent that there has been publicity regarding polling place problems, that publicity has been primarily due to actions taken by the Department of Justice in enforcing the Voting Rights Act. Thus, many people believed that election day irregularities were limited only to particular areas of the country and that these irregularities were largely a thing of the past. As a result of the focus on the 2000 presidential election, however, there is a more general awareness that polling problems are far more prevalent and widespread.

For years, in addition to local poll watchers, both the Republican and Democratic parties have conducted election day operations during which attorneys and political operatives across the country have monitored actions in the polls on election day, and, in the case of recounts, throughout the recount process, sometimes for weeks after the election. In 2000, this activity extended well beyond election day. While the DOJ focus on election day is to gather information to conduct investigations for future action and to address problems that arise on election day, the parties' election day operations have been more focused on identifying problems that could potentially be solved during the election day. [FN98] As part of this operation, the parties maintain phone lines that receive and centralize reporting of election day irregularities. Normally, this operation is over when the polls close in the last state. [FN99] In 2000, however, that was only the beginning. On the day after the election, reports of election day irregularities came flooding into the Democratic National Committee and the Gore/Lieberman campaign. [FN100] Special phone lines were set up to receive these calls and obtain contact information. Several days later, teams of attorneys were set up in Florida to contact complainants and gather and organize the allegations of irregularities. Some of this information was used in the various lawsuits that were brought in Florida.

Despite the numerous organizations that conducted reviews of election day 2000, those reviews resulted in reports, not action. While the Justice Department may have investigated specific allegations, there has been no public comprehensive official investigation into most of the alleged irregularities. Therefore, it is impossible to determine how many of the allegations were meritorious. For purposes of this article, however, it is not necessary to know. There is now a widespread perception that election irregularities do occur in this country—including some beyond the types of problems addressed by the Voting Rights Act. A review of the types of allegations made in 2000 is helpful to an understanding of what steps states can take to restore public confidence in the electoral system.

In 2000 some of the allegations of irregularities were known on election day and others were not discovered until after that day. In the case of some election day allegations, there were opportunities to take steps to attempt to correct them before the polls closed. Following is a summary of the types of allegations of irregularities made and some specific examples of each.

A. Ballot Design Irregularities

Poor layout of a ballot can result in voter confusion. Perhaps the most *430 prominent allegation of flawed ballot design is the now infamous "butterfly ballot" in Palm Beach County Florida. The design of the ballot was such that many people were uncertain which hole to punch for the candidate of their choice. In some instances voters punched more than one hole for president (known as an "overvote"). In other instances, voters believed that they might have punched the wrong hole. When this issue was publicized, there was a concern that many people who intended to vote for Al Gore, in fact cast votes for Pat Buchanan. As a result of this confusion, there were also allegations that voters who were confused or thought that they had miscast their vote were denied an opportunity to discard that ballot and vote a new ballot, even though Florida state law provided that remedy.

Party officials were aware on election day of the alleged confusion caused by the butterfly ballot. Palm Beach county officials were contacted and in some instances, signs were posted in polling places advising people of this confusion and urging that they review their ballot carefully. Information was also put out through radio stations advising of the confusion and attempting to alert voters who had not yet gone to the polls. For some voters, of course, it was too late. This led to numerous calls from individuals who were afraid that they might have voted for the wrong person, seeking advice as to what they could do once they left the polls.

B. Very Long Lines at the Polls

There were numerous complaints on election day that lines, particularly in minority polling places, were excessively long. Long lines allegedly discourage some voters, particularly those who must take off time from work to vote and those whose employers do not readily provide leave for voting. There were allegations that some people who saw the lines in various polling places became discouraged and left without casting votes.

There were also allegations of confusion regarding the rules on voting after the polls close. Most states provide that any voter in line at the time of poll closing is entitled to vote. There were allegations, however, that people waiting in line outside polling places were told that they might as well leave because they would not be allowed to vote even though they were in line at the time of closing.

In one state, a lawsuit was brought on election day seeking to keep the polls open late because it was alleged that long lines caused by inadequate numbers of polling places and voting machines, and machine breakdowns, would result in the de facto denial of the right of many voters to vote. A Circuit Court Judge of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis ordered that the Board of Elections extend the hours of voting, but that order was overturned later that day on appeal to the Missouri Court of Appeals. [FN10]

*431 C. Inadequate Parking Facilities and Lack of Public Transportation

There were allegations that many sites selected for polling places were not easily accessible by public transportation or had inadequate parking available. These allegations were made in Florida as well as other states. Since people sitting in their cars were not in line at the polls, they would not be eligible to vote after normal poll closing times even though they were waiting in the parking lot to find a parking space. Lack of access to public transportation also can cause hardship for voters, particularly for those who must take time off from work. A lengthy commute to the polls or a long walk from public transportation can discourage people from voting.

While, in the absence of an investigation, there was no evidence that most parking and transportation problems were malicious, there were some allegations that local law enforcement authorities directed cars to places where there was no parking available and sought to vigorously enforce no parking zones around polling places even where it was clear that the polling place had inadequate parking facilities available. These types of allegations are ones that can potentially be remedied on election day, if local observers are made aware and know how to intervene with state and local officials to attempt to solve the parking problems.

D. Motor Voter Problems

There were numerous allegations from across the country that voters who had registered under the National Voter Registration Act showed up at their polling place and were not on the rolls. Under the NVRA, state agencies that obtain voter registrations are required to forward them to the appropriate authorities. These allegations are ones that the Department of Justice typically investigates after the election is over to determine whether there were widespread systemic problems or neglect by the state agencies charged with implementing the law.

E. Interference by Law Enforcement Officials

Presence of state and local law enforcement officers can have a negative impact on turnout and can intimidate legitimate voters. There were allegations in various parts of the country that officers set up road blocks outside polling places to perform random seat belt, drivers license and car registration checks; that officers stood outside polling places with lists of outstanding warrants looking for suspects; and that officers stood outside polls suggesting that voters needed to be able to prove their eligibility to vote by producing some type of identification. These types of allegations can be brought to the attention of state and local authorities who have the ability to intervene during election day and stop any unauthorized activity under color of law. Some such allegations were made in Florida on election day and were investigated by state officials. [FN102]

*432 F. Integrity of Ballot Boxes

In most states, ballot boxes (or the equivalent depending on the system used) are collected at the local level and are transported to central locations for tabulation. The integrity of the count depends heavily on the security of those boxes. There were allegations across the country that ballot boxes were missing; that they were found later but their chain of custody could not be determined; that ballot boxes were left in unsecured areas to which there was unrestricted access; and that the number of ballots counted did not correspond to the number of voters voting. Of course, these types of allegations are not new, nor do they come primarily from Florida. Our popular culture has longstanding jokes about people voting from the grave, living in vacant lots and stuffing ballot boxes from the upper midwest to the Deep South going back to the earliest days of our democracy. However, the accuracy of the vote counted depends on the integrity of the system of guarding and accounting for those votes, and while jokes are made about the past, ballot-counting shenanigans are unacceptable in the 21st century.

G. Lack of Training of Poll Workers

Our system of voting depends heavily on the use of volunteers across the country. While elections are managed under the auspices of state and local boards of elections, in most jurisdictions the polling places themselves are run virtually exclusively by volunteers. There were numerous allegations in 2000 that polling place officials refused to answer questions from confused voters; told voters that there was nothing they could do if they made a mistake in casting their ballots; did not allow voters to access a sample ballot or machine; and did not allow voters to have assistance to which they are entitled under federal law. While it is possible that some of these allegations involved the deliberate giving of incorrect information, it is far more likely that the majority of these problems were caused not by malice of poll workers but because of lack of training and supervision.

H. Absentee Voting Irregularities

Absentee voting problems arose with respect to regular routine absent ballots as well as with the unique problem of military overseas ballots. There were allegations that voters who requested absentee ballots received more than one; that voters who requested absentee ballots but did not receive them were not allowed to vote when they showed up at the polls; that partisan representatives of political parties were allowed by local election officials to complete incompletely filled out absentee ballot envelopes; that absentee ballots were obtained on behalf of nursing home inhabitants that were then voided with the assistance of partisan local officials; and that absentee ballots not properly filled out were counted in some jurisdictions and disallowed in others.

*433 In Florida, there was a particular issue with vast numbers of overseas military ballots. Under the terms of a consent decree with the Department of Justice, in Federal elections overseas military ballots must be counted if dated by the date of the election and received within a specified time period. [FN103] There were allegations after the election in Florida in particular that military ballots were counted even though they did not meet the technical requirements, such as the requirement that they be dated.

I. Accuracy of Tabulation and Uniform Standards

As a result of the recount in Florida in 2000, numerous articles and studies have now been written about the relative merits of different types of voting equipment. Accuracy issues are of two kinds: (1) whether the equipment accurately record and read the votes cast by each voter, and (2) whether the equipment correctly tabulate the votes cast. The Florida recounts focused attention on the differences between types of voting machines, their accuracy and the number of ballots routinely disqualified. Prior to the Florida recount it was not widely understood by the public that in any election there are numerous ballots that are disqualified and not counted in precincts across the country. Of course, in an election that is not close, disqualified ballots would not change the outcome of the election and, therefore, are of little concern. In a close election, they could. [FN104] Much of the legislative interest post November 2000 has been on ensuring that state and local governments obtain voting equipment that records accurately as many votes as possible and is as immune as possible from human error. The American public has now become familiar with overvotes, undervotes and other terms that previously were not household words.

In addition to machine failure or inability to accurately read votes cast, the aftermath of election 2000 also drew attention to the lack of uniform standards for counting votes. The Florida pregnant-chad/dimpled-chad debate illustrated the divergent standards (or lack of standards) applied from one precinct to another even within the same state.

J. Bush v. Gore

The opinion of the Supreme Court in Bush v. Gore. [FN105] suggests that states must develop uniform standards for fear of running afoul of equal protection under the Federal Constitution. The per curiam opinion of the Court stated that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applies not only to the granting of the right to vote but also to the manner in *434 which the right to vote is exercised:

The right to vote is protected in more than the initial allocation of the franchise. Equal protection applies as well to the manner of its exercise. Having once granted the right to vote on equal terms, the State may not, by later arbitrary and disparate treatment, value one person's vote over that of another. [FN106]

While the full significance of Bush v. Gore for state administration of elections will evolve over the next few election cycles, it is clear that more attention must be given on a statewide level to the conduct of elections at the local level. The per curiam opinion notes that the question of whether local entities within a State may develop different systems for implementing elections was not at issue in the case. [FN107] However, the Court's equal protection analysis suggests that where state officials confer authority on local officials the state may have a greater burden to ensure the equal application of its laws to voters. [FN108] It may no longer be sufficient to entrust local officials with the same level of discretion they have exercised in the past.

VII. States Should Act Now to Stop Bad Things from Happening to Voters in the Polls.

The states have the authority to regulate activity that is permitted in the polling places on election day, including regulations as to who is allowed in the polls, and to adopt rules to keep order in the polls. As noted above, nearly all of the states have used this authority to pass laws that proscribe vote fraud, and several states have laws that proscribe untoward actions by poll officials or others that deny or abridge peoples' right to vote without intimidation or interference. But the states have delegated to the counties the responsibility for conducting the election and maintaining order in the polls, and by doing so, the states have abdicated their responsibility for preventing bad things from happening to voters in the polls on election day.

The history of injuring voters through administrative action, as reflected in the federal voting rights cases, was one of state malfeasance, in the first instance. Then, when the states' rules and actions were enjoined, the states adopted legislation leaving it up to the counties to take the arbitrary actions that deprived people of their right to vote. This pattern continues today, as counties continue to deprive people of their voting rights by misusing the responsibility delegated by the states to conduct elections.

11 TMPPCRLR 401

Moreover, deprivations of voting rights today transcend the racially based actions that soil our nation's history. The episodes that came to light in the wake of the presidential election in November 2000, and the United States Supreme Court's analysis of unequal application of administrative rules as violations of the Equal Protection Clause in Bush v. Gore, illustrate *435 that deprivations of voters' rights because of administrative malfeasance, disregard of the rules or a failure to apply rules equally to all voters and votes is unlawful. Since the states have the authority to set the rules for the conduct of elections, it is up to the states to remedy those deprivations.

The federal observer program as it is administered under the Voting Rights Act illustrates that government officials can design programs to anticipate where there will be an unequal application of state rules at the polls, and to direct remedies at those polling places where the problems are likely to occur. States can do likewise, and could devise even more effective programs to anticipate where voters may be deprived of their rights at the polls, given the states' closer proximity to their counties and more direct knowledge of the activities that occur during elections in the state. States already have much information about undervotes, overvotes and other instances where voters have been ineffective in casting their ballots, and can determine where voters are deprived of their rights at the polls. Once the identity of these polling places is established, state law should give state election officials the responsibility of contacting the county election officials to inform them of the nature of the problem at the polls and of the correct state election procedures. In instances where the county officials are unwilling or unable to take action to assure that the anticipated problems do not occur, state law should give state election directors authority to direct that correct procedures be used, and to use personnel directly responsible to the state officials in the polls in order to insure that state procedures are followed.

The Voting Rights Act does not give the federal observers or the U.S. Department of Justice authority to stop discriminatory action as it occurs. [FN112] But just the presence of disinterested third-party observers under the Voting Rights Act has the prophylactic effect of discouraging errant behavior in the polls, especially when those observers represent a government agency that is intent on ensuring correct behavior toward voters. The states can go much further, and confer on observers authority to inform polling place workers about correct state procedures, and to put state supervisory personnel in contact with county or polling place officials to direct them to follow state voting rules. If the Voting Section of the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division can do such a fact-directed job from Washington, D.C. and can locate polling places where minority group voters are likely to be disadvantaged or at which there may be efforts to intimidate voters, surely the states, from a closer vantage point, with knowledge of their own procedures and familiarity with their own county election administrators, could do at least as effective a job. After all, the state rules are the ones that are to be followed, and it is their citizens and voters who will be victimized by their own officials.

If the states do not assume the responsibility for conducting effective *436 elections when the counties fail to do so, then the United States Congress should consider whether federal civil rights voting laws should be expanded to include the deprivations of voting rights at the polls because of administrative malfeasance, disregard of the rules, or a failure to apply rules equally to all voters and votes. At the same time, Congress should consider similarly expanding the unquestionably successful federal observer program.

Such legislation could be constitutionally based on the Equal Protection Clause rationale of Bush v. Gore. There is precedent for this approach in the Voting Rights Act itself. The Act initially was based on the Fifteenth Amendment. The Fifteenth Amendment's protections apply only to deprivations of the right to vote on the grounds of race, color or previous condition of servitude. When the Voting Rights Act was amended in 1975 to prohibit discrimination against language minority groups, the amended provisions were based on the Fourteenth Amendment as well as the Fifteenth Amendment in order to eliminate possible challenges to the new provisions on the grounds that the protected minority language people would not be found to be racial groups. [FN113]

Conclusion

The continuous deprivation of voting rights faced by United States citizens at election polls, coupled with the notoriety of those problems following the November 2000 presidential election, make it incumbent upon the states to use their authority to regulate the election process. States should to adopt procedures for: (1) determining where voters will face obstacles when casting effective ballots at the polls, and (2) interceding and remedying those obstacles in any county that fails or refuses to remedy them on its own. These procedures may follow the federal observer model or may a variation of other models. If states fail to discharge their responsibility, federal legislation should consider expanding the civil rights voting laws and the federal observer program in order to address such deprivation of voting rights.

Reform to correct voter discrimination has financial implications for the states, however. [FN111] For example, there is a widespread belief that voting technology across the country must be updated. This is costly, and federal action to provide funds is critical. But, even beyond the cost of voting machines, establishing an effective system for training election officials, monitoring elections and enforcing the laws will require a substantial commitment of resources by the states—a commitment they may be unable to make without federal financial assistance.

A white voter waiting in line to vote stated to white poll official John P. Bewley that she was unable to obtain a yellow sample ballot distributed by the Alabama Democratic Conference. The black voter standing next in line had such a ballot. Mr. Bewley stated, "You ain't [sic] of the right color." During the same day, Mr. Bewley stated to federal observer Riddle, "See, the niggers bring in these yellow marked ballots. The nigger preachers run the niggers down here, you know. They tell them how to vote. I don't think that's right." [FN121]

Poll officials instructed white registered voters to confirm their registration status in the office of the Probate Judge. Black voters whose names were not on the list were in each instance simply told that they could not vote, and were given no instruction by poll officials. White voter Salter's name did not appear on the list, and Ms. Salter acknowledged that she resided in a rural precinct and not in box 11-1. Ms. Salter nevertheless was allowed to vote an unchallenged ballot directly on the machine. [FN122]

Ms. Lewis, who required assistance because of a vision problem, signed the poll list and stated that she wished for her companion (unidentified) to provide assistance in voting for her. White poll official Windham stated, "Can't nobody go in there with you." After a pause, Mr. Windham stated to Ms. Lewis, "you can fill out an affidavit and then she can go in with you. Can't you [read]?" Mr. Windham's tone and manner were sufficiently abusive that Ms. Lewis left the voting place. Some moments later she was observed to remark to a companion, who was trying to persuade her to make another attempt to vote, "I've done had trouble with them twice before and I'm not begging them any more. I'm not scared but I'm not begging anybody." Ms. Lewis returned accompanied by Mr. Richard Rabb, at that time the Chair of the Conecuh county Branch of the Alabama Democratic Conference. Ms. Lewis was allowed to vote, and the poll officials provided necessary assistance with the affidavit. Ms. Lewis remained very upset and remarked, "Why couldn't they have let me vote to begin with?" [FN123]

Black voters at box 9-1 (Old Town) were told throughout the day of the October 12, 1982 special run-off election, that no more than two voters were allowed in the polling place at one time. This *441 restriction was imposed on 30-35 occasions. In no instance were white voters required to conform to this procedure, and the poll officials allowed as many as five white voters in the polling place at a time. [FN124]

Ms. Stacey enforced the limitation on the amount of time a voter could spend in the booth in a random and discriminatory fashion. She enforced the limitation against black voters more frequently than against white voters. During the last hour of voting the requirement was applied exclusively against black persons. On at least two occasions she told black voters that their time had elapsed when, in fact, it had not. [FN125]

During the course of the day, poll officials addressed all black voters by their first names. Older white voters were addressed by the courtesy titles of Mr. and Ms. [FN126]

White poll official James Ellis initiated new procedures for assistance of black voters. Without notice to any person, Mr. Ellis required assistants accompanying voters into the polling place to remain 30 feet outside the polls until Mr. Ellis had finished interviewing the voter and summoned the assistant. [FN127]

Poll officials who assisted black voters did not read the ballot to the voters or otherwise advise the voters of the contests and the candidates. They simply asked the voters, "Who do you want to vote for?"

 Poll official Lois Stacey marked the ballot for a voter she was assisting in contests in which the voter did not express a preference.

Poll officials frequently served as assistants without asking voters receiving assistance who they wanted to assist them. On a number of occasions, poll officials serving as assistants did not read the complete ballot to the voters. [FN128]

Louisiana

Louisiana Statutes § 14:119. Bribery of voters.

Bribery of voters is the giving or offering to give, directly or indirectly, any money, or anything of apparent present or prospective value to any voter at any general, primary, or special election, or at any convention of a recognized political party, with the intent to influence the voter in the casting of his ballot. The acceptance of, or the offer to accept, directly or indirectly, any money, or anything of apparent present or prospective value, by any such voters under such circumstances shall also constitute bribery of voters. Whoever commits the crime of bribery of voters shall be fined not more than two thousand dollars or imprisoned with or without hard labor for not more than two years, or both, for the first offense. On a second offense, or any succeeding offense, the penalty shall be a fine of not more than five thousand dollars or imprisonment at hard labor for not more than five years, or both.

Louisiana Statutes § 18:1462. Acts prohibited on election day; electioneering; exception; enforcement; penalty.

The Legislature of Louisiana recognizes that the right to vote is a right that is essential to the effective operation of a democratic government. Due to a past, longstanding history of election problems, such as multiple voting, votes being recorded for persons who did not vote, votes being recorded for deceased persons, voting by non-residents, vote buying, and voter intimidation, the legislature finds that the state has a compelling interest in securing a person's right to vote in an environment which is free from intimidation, harassment, confusion, obstruction, and undue influence. The legislature, therefore, enacts this Subsection to provide for a six hundred foot campaign-free zone around polling places to provide to each voter such an environment in which to exercise his right to vote. Except as otherwise specifically provided by law, it shall be unlawful for any person, between the hours of 6:00 a.m. and 9:00 p.m., to perform or cause to be performed any of the following acts within any polling place being used in an election on election day or within any place wherein absence

Louisiana Revised Statutes § 47:1405. Secrecy of ballot, interference with voter, penalty.

No person shall interfere or attempt to interfere with any voter when marking his ballot, or endeavor to induce any voter before voting to show how he is about to mark or has marked his ballot, or influence or attempt to influence any voter to vote for or against a particular candidate, or otherwise violate any of the provisions of this Chapter or rules adopted pursuant thereto. Whoever violates this Section shall be punished in accordance with R.S. 18:1461, R.S. 14:119, R.S. 14:120, R.S. 14:136, or any other applicable law enacted to punish violations of laws relating to other elections.

Louisiana Revised Statutes § 18:1451. Election Offenses: penalties.

No person shall knowingly, willfully, or intentionally: 1) Offer, promise, solicit, or accept money or anything of present or prospective value to secure or influence a vote or registration of a person. 2) Intimidate, directly or indirectly, any voter or prospective voter in matters concerning voting or nonvoting or registration or nonregistration. 3) Offer money or anything of present or prospective value or use, directly or indirectly, any form of intimidation to influence the action or encourage inaction of any public official with regard to the duties of his office or to influence a commissioner or watcher in his decision to serve or not to serve as such or in the performance of his duties on election day. Whoever violates any provision of this Section shall be fined not more than one thousand dollars or be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both. On a second offense, or any succeeding offense, the penalty shall be a fine of not more than two thousand five hundred dollars or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

- Posited a rebuttable presumption that people were literate who finished the sixth grade;
- Declared that actions by state or local officials were state action;
- Allowed courts to make pattern or practice findings and thereafter issue declarations that "any person of such race or color within the affected area" was qualified to vote if certain minimal facts were presented;

- Established court-appointed voting referees who could receive applications for an order that people were qualified to vote and had been deprived of the opportunity to register under color of law, take evidence, and report to the court whether the applicant was qualified to vote. This was followed by a show-cause order within 10 days on why an order should not be entered in accordance with the report; there would be a hearing only if there were genuine issues of material fact; and
- Allowed for three-judge courts if a finding of a pattern or practice of discrimination was requested.

These "tests or devices" were suspended in states and counties determined by a formula in Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act based on the use of literacy tests and other pre-application devices (such as having current voters vouch for your good moral character), and low voter turnout. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973b. Later, this provision was made permanent and nationwide. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973ag. Originally, states and counties covered under the formula could terminate their special coverage ("bail out") after five years by showing, in a lawsuit before a three-judge court in the federal district court for the District of Columbia, that no test or device had been used to deprive anyone of the right to vote during that period. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973b. Since the Act itself suspended those tests or devices for only five years, it was thought that it would be relatively simple for states and counties who complied with the suspension to bail out after the 5-year period. In 1970, the time period was extended to 10 years; in 1975, it was extended to 17 years. In 1982, the approach changed to terminate the special coverage at the end of 25 years following the effective date of the 1982 amendments. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(a)(9). In 1982, the bail-out provisions were amended substantially to allow individual counties within a fully covered state to bail out and to set out a number of specific qualifications that a jurisdiction needs to meet in order to bail out. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(b)(1)-(3).

[FN27]. The examiners are commonly referred to as federal registrars. These were people appointed by the head of the Civil Service Commission, now the Office of Personnel Management, to examine voter applicants as to their qualifications under those portions of state law that were valid under the U.S. Constitution and laws. If the applicants satisfied the state requirements, their names were put on a list that was given to the county registrar, who then had to add them to the county voter registration rolls. In this way, some semblance of state authority over the voter registration process was preserved: registrants satisfied state requirements and a state-authorized official put the voters' names on the rolls. To safeguard against discriminatory purges of those newly enfranchised voters, their names cannot be purged from the voter rolls without the approval of the Office of Personnel Management. 42 U.S.C. § 1973c(b)(4).

[FN32]. See Appendix B, Assignment of Federal Observers Under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973f, by Year and State. There were 4,698 federal observers assigned to polling places in five states from 1966 through 1969; 7,034 federal observers were assigned to nine states in the 1970s; 6,598 federal observers were assigned to 11 states in the 1980s, and 3,753 federal observers were assigned to 13 states in the 1990s. In 2000, 640 federal observers were assigned to 11 states.

[FN33]. U.S. v. Conecuh County, No. 83-1201-H (S.D. Ala. June 12, 1984). The federal observers' reports are not public documents, so there are very few examples on the public record of the facts that the observers have witnessed. One such public document is the Plaintiff's Response to Interrogatories and Request for Production of Documents in Conecuh County. Some of the specific examples of the kind of discriminatory treatment that was afforded African-American voters described in the text that follows are taken from the excerpts of the Conecuh County responses at Appendix C, while others are based on the author's first-hand knowledge.

[FN36]. After the Voting Rights Act enabled African-Americans in the deep south to register to vote, it became common for civil rights workers and local African-American residents to drive the new voters to the polls and to give assistance to those who needed it. This was a natural outgrowth of the organizing required during the civil rights movement to achieve voter registration for black people. It provided transportation—many people did not have cars—and gave confidence and protection to these newly enfranchised voters at the polling places from which they had so recently been excluded by white poll workers and voters who did not want them there. This tradition of "hauling" voters to the polls and giving assistance to voters who need it continues today, especially in many rural areas.

Section 203 of the Act does not include the other special provisions of Section 4, such as the preclearance, federal examiner and federal observer provisions. Lawsuits under Section 203 must be brought before a three-judge court. As a result of amendments since 1975, coverage under Section 203 now applies to counties that have more than 5 percent of voting age citizens who are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; have more than 10,000 voting age citizens who are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; or have a part of an Indian reservation, and more than 5 percent of the American Indian or Alaska Native voting age citizens are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; and the illiteracy rate of the language minority group citizens is higher than the national illiteracy rate. 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1(a)(2). The counties covered under the language minority provisions of Sections 4 and 203 are listed in the Appendix to 28 U.S.C. Part 55.

[FN43]. Counties in Arizona, New York and Texas were certified by the U.S. Attorney General. Counties in California, New Mexico and Utah were certified by federal district courts under Section 3(c) of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973a(c). Section 3(e) provides for certification in a lawsuit brought "under any statute to enforce the voting guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment... (1) as part of any interlocutory order... or (2) as part of any final judgment if the court finds that violations of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment justifying equitable relief have occurred..."

[FN44]. From 1990 through 2000, there were 2,449 federal observers assigned to elections in the states of the Deep South, very few of which involved discrimination against language minority group members, and there were 2,215 federal observers assigned to monitor elections in other areas of the country, most of which involved discrimination against language minority group members. See Appendix B.

[FN45]. Mail addressed to streets using the Spanish nickname was delivered because the postal personnel were familiar with the local Spanish language usages, as the poll workers were not.

[FN57]. Voters were confused because they voted in tribal elections without problem, and were not told, for example, that under state law they had been purged from the county voter rolls because they did not vote with some particular frequency and in particular elections, such as every two or four years in general elections. To add to the confusion, in many areas the tribal elections and the state elections were held on different dates but at the same locations. Prior to the National Voter Registration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg et seq., voter registration in many counties in Indian country was conducted only in the county seat, far from reservation housing, until, in some instances, litigation required that deputy registrars be made available at reservation sites, and that voter purge procedures be modified to allow fair notice to Native-American voters. [FN58]. Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina and Texas are fully covered under the Voting Rights Act's special provisions by the formula in Section 4 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b. One or more counties are specially covered under Section 4 in California, Florida, Michigan, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, South Dakota and Virginia. All jurisdictions covered under Section 4 of the Act are listed in the Appendix to 28 CFR Part 55.

[FN59]. Certification under Section 3(a) of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(a), is for a particular term as defined by the court. Certification by the U.S. Attorney General under Section 6 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973f, is for an unlimited time. Jurisdictions certified under Section 6 can seek to have their certification terminated under Section 13 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973j. Appendix D is a list of the jurisdictions that have been certified for examiners by court order under Section 3(a) of the Act.

[FN60]. The Voting Section is headed by a chief and four deputy chiefs. There also are special counsels who are senior attorneys assigned to perform particular duties. The pre-election work for a particular jurisdiction usually is overseen by a deputy chief if the jurisdiction is a defendant in recent litigation. Otherwise, the pre-election supervision is handled by the special litigation counsel for elections.

[FN61]. Federal observers are assigned and supervised by the Office of Personnel Management. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973i. OPM centralized the observer program in the OPM office in Atlanta, Georgia, over the past several years. Beginning in 2002 the program was centralized in the OPM office in Denver, Colorado.

There is no standing group of people who are federal observers. Rather, the people chosen to serve as federal observers at a particular election are volunteers, usually from among the OPM nationwide staff except when special abilities are required, such as Native-American language ability. General training sessions are held for observers and observer supervisors at selected sites during the year. Often people will volunteer to serve as observers in election after election, but they are not always available for every election because of the demands of their regular work assignments and prior obligations. Because of the need to recruit observers for each election, and the logistical requirements of transportation (airplane tickets, rental cars) and lodging, the OPM coordinator and the Voting Section supervising attorney are in contact throughout the year to discuss observer needs in upcoming elections.

[FN62]. If a county for which federal observers is recommended has not been certified yet for federal examiners, a separate certification of the county by the U.S. Attorney General is necessary. Certifications are effective upon publication in the Federal Register, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(b). OPM must publish in the Federal Register a location for an examiner's office. 42 U.S.C. § 1973(a).

[FN64]. Initial facts indicating possible violations of the Voting Rights Act most often come to DOJ through complaints by telephone, by mail, or in conversation with DOJ attorneys, paralegals and analysts in the performance of their routine duties.

[FN76]. A letter of understanding was developed between DOJ and San Juan County, New Mexico, which required the county to adopt a manual of procedures to comply with the language minority requirements of the Voting Rights Act. The manual would become final after review and concurrence by DOJ. Changes in the procedures would become effective upon the concurrence of DOJ. Letters of understanding have not been widely used by DOJ in its Voting Rights Act enforcement. The letters have the advantage of getting a fast remedy and avoiding the uncertainties of litigation. The main disadvantage of using a letter of understanding is the inability to seek contempt of court sanctions if the county does not follow the steps in the letter or the county's manual of procedures. If the actions that the county fails to take are significant, a legal action would need to be filed at that time, prolonging the time for obtaining a remedy.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE BRADLEY J. SCHLOZMAN, PRINCIPAL DEPUTY ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, CONCERNING THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT: SECTIONS 6 AND 8, FEDERAL EXAMINER AND OBSERVER PROGRAMS

Chairman Chabot, Ranking Member Nadler, distinguished members of the Subcommittee:

I am Bradley Schlozman, the Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General of the Civil Rights Division at the Department of Justice. As I have underscored in previous testimony before this Subcommittee, the President has directed the full power and might of the Justice Department to enforcing the Voting Rights Act and preserving the integrity of our voting process. This Administration looks forward to working with Congress on the reauthorization of this important legislation.

012197

It is my privilege today to provide you with an overview of the Justice Department's use of sections 6 and 8 of the Voting Rights Act,¹ which pertain to Federal examiners and Federal observers. As you know, these provisions, like section 5,² are slated to expire in August 2007.

FEDERAL EXAMINERS

Let me begin by explaining what "federal examiners" are within the meaning of the Voting Rights Act. Federal examiners are essentially officials assigned to a particular political subdivision to whom certain complaints of voting discrimination can be made. Governed by section 6 of the Act, the authority to appoint Federal examiners was first designed as a congressional response to the racially discriminatory voter registration practices that existed throughout the South at the time of the Act's original passage in 1965. Examiners are charged with processing (or "examining") applicants for voter registration and making a list of those applicants who meet State eligibility rules; the list is then given to the local county registrar, who is required to put those names on the county's voter registration rolls. Those on the examiner's list are commonly called "federally registered voters." The Voting Rights Act also requires the examiners to be available during each of the jurisdiction's elections, and for two days afterward, to take complaints from any federally registered voter claiming that he/she had not been allowed to vote.

Federal examiners can be appointed in two separate ways. The first route is through section 6's empowerment of the Attorney General to "certify" for the appointment of Federal examiners any jurisdiction falling within the coverage of the Voting Rights Act in which there is reason to believe that voters have been denied the right to vote on account of their race or status as a language minority. In particular, the Attorney General must certify that either: (i) he has received complaints in writing from twenty or more residents alleging that they have been denied the right to vote under color of law on account of race or color or because they are a member of a language minority and he believes such complaints to be meritorious; or (ii) in his judgment, the appointment of examiners is necessary to enforce the guarantees of the 14th or 15th Amendments. The second method by which Federal examiners may be appointed is for a Federal court to do so pursuant to section 3(a) as part of an order of equitable relief in a voting rights lawsuit to remedy violations of the 14th or 15th Amendment. Judicial certifications, unlike those of the Attorney General, are not restricted to those political subdivisions covered by section 4 of the Voting Rights Act. Regardless of who makes the formal certification, once the determination is made, the actual selection of the examiner is undertaken by the Director of the Office of Personnel Management (OPM), who then oversees the examiner's activities.

The Voting Rights Act's ban on literacy tests and other discriminatory practices has mitigated many of the voter registration problems that made examiners so important. As a result, the need for, and role of, Federal examiners has greatly diminished over time. Although there are still 148 counties and parishes in 9 States that the Attorney General has certified for Federal examiners,³ nearly all of these certifications were certified shortly after the Voting Rights Act was passed in 1965 when conditions were radically different from today.⁴ Moreover, many of the counties/parishes have not been the source of any race-based voting registration complaints for decades.

According to OPM, there have been no new "federally registered voters" (i.e., voters registered by Federal examiners) added in any jurisdiction throughout the country since 1983. Nor has the Department of Justice received any complaints about covered jurisdictions refusing to register Federal voters in decades.

In addition to the great advances in minority access to the franchise today as compared to 30-40 years ago, the decline in registration-related complaints is also attributable to the passage of the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 (NVRA), which made voter registration dramatically more accessible.⁵ Prior to this 1993 Act,

³ There are also 19 political subdivisions in 12 States currently certified by court order. With two exceptions, all of these certifications pertain to language-minority issues. An additional 14 jurisdictions in eight States previously were certified for Federal examiners by Federal courts under section 3(a), but the designations have since expired.

there were few Federal standards for voter registration. Through the NVRA, however, Congress established specific, uniform requirements for voter registration and State maintenance of voter registration lists. All of these requirements are applicable across the United States, not just in those jurisdictions certified for Federal examiners or otherwise covered by the Voting Rights Act. The reality today is that the only real importance of the Federal examiner provision from a practical standpoint is its function as a statutory prerequisite to the Attorney General's ability to call upon OPM to assign Federal observers to monitor particular elections in certified jurisdictions.

FEDERAL OBSERVERS

At any time after a Federal examiner has been appointed to a particular jurisdiction, the Attorney General may request under section 8 that the Director of OPM assign Federal observers to monitor elections in that jurisdiction.⁶ These observers are Federal employees who are recruited and supervised by OPM. They are authorized by statute to enter polling places and vote-tabulation rooms in order to observe whether eligible voters are being permitted to vote and whether votes cast by eligible voters are being properly counted.

The OPM observers work in conjunction with attorneys from the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division. Department of Justice attorneys assist OPM with the observers' training, brief the observers on relevant issues prior to the election, and work closely with them on election day. Federal observers are instructed to watch, listen, and take careful notes of everything that happens inside the polling place/vote-tabulation room during an election. They are also trained not to interfere with the election in any way. After the election, Justice Department attorneys debrief the observers, and the observers usually complete written reports on their observations. These reports are sent on to the Civil Rights Division and can be used in court if necessary.

Most Federal observers dispatched to cover elections find no irregularities. Still, problems occur. Over at least the last decade, most of these have related to compliance with the language minority requirements of section 203.⁷ Where problems are discovered, a variety of actions may be taken depending on the relevant circumstances. On occasion, Justice Department personnel will assess the situation and work with county/parish officials on election day to clarify Federal legal requirements and immediately resolve the identified problem. Other times, the Department will send a letter to the jurisdiction following the election in which we identify certain incidents or practices that should be addressed or improved in the future (e.g., removal of certain poll workers, additional training for election-day officials, etc.). Department attorneys likewise may recommend further investigation. If no Federal issues are identified, the matter may be referred to State authorities. If necessary, the Department will commence a civil action (or contempt motion if applicable) to enforce the protections of the Voting Rights Act.

Notwithstanding the general overall compliance with the Voting Rights Act, the Department of Justice has taken full advantage of the Federal observer provisions to help avoid slippage or complacency by covered jurisdictions. In 2004, for example, the Civil Rights Division worked with OPM to send 1,463 observers to cover 55 elections in 30 jurisdictions in 10 different States. Meanwhile, already in 2005, Federal observers have been dispatched to 21 elections in 17 jurisdictions in 10 different States.

In areas of the country where Federal observers cannot be sent, the Civil Rights Division will send its own staff lawyers to monitor elections if it has received complaints or has uncovered credible evidence of possible violations of the Voting Rights Act. In fact, the great bulk of our recent enforcement cases since, say, 1993, have involved jurisdictions (e.g., Massachusetts, California, New York, New Jersey, Florida, Washington, and Pennsylvania) where there is no statutory authority to send Federal observers. We have expended substantial resources in this endeavor. For example, in 2004, the Department of Justice sent 533 departmental personnel to monitor 108 elections in 80 jurisdictions in 27 different States. So far in 2005, the Department has sent 186 personnel to cover 24 elections in 21 jurisdictions in 9 different States. Those monitors helped account for the record-setting work we have done in enforcing the Voting Rights Act in recent years.

As I have said before to this Subcommittee, the Civil Rights Division has made the vigorous enforcement of voting rights a primary objective, and we have been very successful in doing so. Our election monitoring and observer coverage is just one small part of that effort. I thank the committee for the opportunity to submit this statement.

Subject: Department of Justice's Activities to Address Past Election-Related Voting Irregularities

Election-day problems in Florida and elsewhere in November 2000 raised concerns about voting systems that included, among other things, alleged voting irregularities that may have affected voter access to the polls. The term voting irregularities generally refers to a broad array of complaints relating to voting and/or elections that may involve violations of federal voting rights and/or federal criminal law for which the Department of Justice (DOJ) has enforcement responsibilities.

You requested that we review activities at DOJ to help ensure voter access to the polls and actions to address allegations of voting irregularities. This report (1) identifies and describes changes DOJ has made since November 2000 to help ensure voter access to the polls; (2) identifies and describes actions that the Voting Section in DOJ's Civil Rights Division has taken to track, address, and assess allegations of election-related voting irregularities received between November 2000 and December 2003; and (3) assesses the Voting Section's internal control¹ activities ¹Election-related refers to a preliminary investigation, matter, or case that the Voting Section initiated based on allegations about a specific election. A matter is an activity that has been assigned an identification number but has not resulted in a court filing of a complaint, indictment, or information. A case is an activity that has been assigned the same identification number that it had as a matter and has resulted in the court filing of a complaint, indictment, or information.

²Internal controls are integral components of an organization's management that provide reasonable assurance of objectives that include, among other things, efficient operations. They comprise the plans, methods, and procedures used to meet missions, goals, and objectives and, in doing so, support performance-based management. For additional information on internal controls, see GAO Internal Control: Standards for Internal Control in the Federal Government, AIMD-00-213.1 (Washington, D.C.: November 1, 1999).

to help ensure relevant, accurate, and reliable recording and documentation of allegations of voting irregularities to accurately track actions taken in response to allegations and provide accurate and complete information to the public and congressional committees.

We primarily performed our work at DOJ's Civil Rights Division, Voting Section. We obtained relevant documentation and interviewed responsible officials regarding DOJ's activities to help ensure voter access to the polls. To identify and describe changes made since November 2000, we reviewed documentation on DOJ's efforts to monitor and observe elections, increase emphasis on enforcement of minority language and overseas voters' rights, disseminate election-related guidance, and increase its resources to address voting issues. To identify and describe actions that the Voting Section took to track, address, and assess allegations of voting irregularities, we reviewed telephone logs and 34 files with information on a preliminary investigation, matters, and cases that the Voting Section considered to be election-related voting irregularities initiated from November 2000 to December 2003. To assess the Voting Section's internal controls, we obtained available documentation of policies, procedures, and techniques the Voting Section has to manage allegations of voting irregularities and considered them in relation to GAO's internal control standards. We also interviewed officials and obtained documentation from DOJ's Criminal Division, Public Integrity Section (PIN), in relation to the coordination between the Voting Section and PIN to address voter access to the polls.

On August 31, 2004, we provided your staffs a briefing document on the results of our work. Enclosure I contains the materials we presented at that time. Our audit work was performed in Washington, D.C., from May 2003 through August 2004 in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards.

Background

The Voting Section in the Civil Rights Division is charged with the responsibility of enforcing federal voting rights statutes that are designed to safeguard the right to vote of racial and language minorities; disabled, elderly, and illiterate persons; and military and overseas voters, among others. The Voting Section is also charged with the responsibility of enforcing federal statutes that, among other things, address issues such as voter registration, provisional voting, and voter information. Provisional voting permits eligible persons to vote on election day if their names are not on voter registration lists, with the understanding that each person's eligibility will be verified after the election and their votes counted, if eligible. (See enc. I, and attach. I, for more information on statutes that the Voting Section enforces.)

The Voting Section, among other things, monitors election-day activities to ensure voting rights are protected and initiates investigations and opens matters—an activity that has not resulted in a court filing of a complaint, indictment, or information—to examine allegations of voting irregularities that fall within the jurisdiction of the Civil Rights Division. If warranted, a matter may culminate in a case—an activity that has resulted in the filing of a complaint, indictment, or information with a federal court.

The Voting Section also may initiate matters to monitor private lawsuits. Voting Section attorneys are generally responsible for conducting investigations and prosecuting cases.

The Voting Section also coordinates with PIN to refer allegations the Voting Section receives that involve violations of criminal statutes related to voting fraud. For example, in relation to the 2002 federal election, the Voting Section referred three matters deemed to be potential violations of criminal laws to PIN, which assumed responsibility for the investigations. In addition, the Voting Section and PIN have provided joint training to Assistant U.S. Attorneys, with the Voting Section presenting information about civil rights statutes that are to protect the right to vote and PIN presenting information about criminal statutes that are to prevent election fraud.

Results

Since November 2000, DOJ has implemented changes to help ensure voter access to the polls. The Voting Section emphasized the importance of its monitoring of election-day activities and increased its monitoring of these activities. In 2000, DOJ attorneys and professional staff monitored elections in 5 counties in 5 states. By 2002, the number of election jurisdictions monitored by DOJ attorneys and professional staff increased to 19 counties in 10 states, with monitoring of elections in counties in Florida accounting for the bulk of the increase. The Voting Section also (1) placed a greater priority on protecting the voting rights of language minority voters by helping to ensure that certain covered jurisdictions provided bilingual voting materials for elections; (2) placed a priority on enforcing and preparing for compliance with the federal statute to help ensure voting rights of overseas voters; (3) provided additional training to Assistant U.S. Attorneys on civil rights statutes to educate them about voters' rights; and (4) provided guidance to states regarding the implementation of sections of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) that DOJ enforces.² For example, the Voting Section provided guidance to states by issuing a press release that outlined provisions of HAVA that took effect on January 1, 2004, such as provisional voting and identification requirements for new voters who register by mail.

The Attorney General directed the Civil Rights Division to work with civil rights leaders, state and local election officials, and U.S. Attorney Offices prior to election day in an effort to help ensure that citizens' voting rights are protected. The Attorney General also directed the Criminal Division to work with these same groups in helping to preserve ballot integrity and prevent election offenses. Almost all of the U.S. Attorney Offices reported that they had contacted various state or local officials prior to the November 2002 election. Voting Section officials reported that the Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division and staff from that division met with various civil rights organizations.

According to Voting Section officials, DOJ plans to help ensure voter access for the upcoming November 2004 election include increasing its monitoring of elections, coordinating with civil rights organizations, and establishing procedures for bringing the concerns of civil rights organizations about specific issues or jurisdictions to DOJ on or before election day in November 2004. Voting Section officials also said that final decisions as to where monitoring will be conducted are not made public until shortly before an election. (See enc. I for more information.)

The Voting Section has used several means of tracking allegations of voting irregularities and the Section's actions with regard to those allegations. First, the Voting Section used telephone logs to track telephone calls regarding allegations of voting irregularities it received related to the November 2000 and 2002 elections. According to the Voting Section, contractors were hired to help handle the unprecedented number of calls that were received concerning the November 2000 election situation to help ensure that the public would be able to voice opinions and concerns. Second, DOJ tracks matters and cases through its Interactive Case Management (ICM) system—its formal process for tracking and managing work activities. Prior to opening a matter, the Voting Section may make a determination that an allegation does not fall within DOJ's jurisdiction or may initiate a preliminary investigation about an allegation. Third, the Voting Section tracked monitoring of elections using logs and for some election-monitoring activities they opened matters; thus, it has not routinely tracked election-monitoring activities through the ICM system. (See enc. I for more information.)

Actions that Voting Section attorneys took to address allegations of voting irregularities initiated from November 2000 to December 2003 included contacting cognizant election officials at the state and local levels; obtaining data as appropriate; interviewing voters affected by alleged voting irregularities; meeting with minority groups; and assessing the merits of the allegations to determine what, if any, further action was needed. Attorneys in the Voting Section addressed allegations of voting irregularities by first determining whether the allegations were related to violations of federal civil rights statutes and then, if warranted, initiating a preliminary investigation or matter to determine whether an allegation had merit. If warranted, a matter may culminate in a case that is filed with a federal court. We reviewed files for 1 closed preliminary investigation, 25 closed matters, and 8 open and closed cases that the Voting Section considered election-related. The preliminary investigation and 13 matters were closed because they lacked merit. The remaining 12 matters were closed because the state or voting jurisdiction took action to remedy an issue, a state court issued an order addressing the issue, the voting jurisdiction implemented changes for future elections, or Voting Section attorneys provided election officials feedback following the on-site monitoring of elections. Six cases remain open pending fulfillment of consent decrees entered into on behalf of DOJ and the jurisdiction in alleged violation of federal statute, and two cases were closed because states had taken action in response to consent decrees. Enclosure I and attachment IV provide detailed information on actions taken regarding selected matters and cases that the Voting Section considered as involving election-related voting irregularities initiated from November 2000 to December 2003.

Regarding internal controls, we found that the Voting Section did not have a reliable method to consistently record and document telephone calls received alleging voting irregularities. According to Voting Section officials, the number of calls received following the November 2000 election far exceeded the number received in past elections. As a result, the Voting Section used a contractor to assist in handling the telephone calls. To track some of the telephone calls related to the November 2000 election, Voting Section and contractor staff used telephone logs that had several broad categories to capture the subject of the allegation, rows for states from which the calls originated and, for the most part, tabulated the numbers of calls using tick marks. Voting Section staff also kept two other types of logs to record some telephone calls, which included columns to record a caller's name, state, telephone number, and description of the call. Our analysis of the contractor telephone logs found, among other things, that these logs did not include a way to record calls from 4 states—Arkansas, Kansas, Montana, and North Dakota. According to Voting Section officials, these 4 states were left off the contractor logs inadvertently, although these officials noted that they were unaware of any calls received from these states. Our analysis of logs that Voting Section staff completed found that Voting Section staff recorded having received calls from some of these states. The Voting Section improved upon the telephone log for the November 2002 election by having one log that consistently provided for documenting the caller's name, telephone number, and action taken. Compared with the telephone log that contractor staff maintained and one of the three types of logs that Voting Section staff maintained after the November 2000 election, which had several columns to broadly categorize the subject of the telephone calls, the November 2002 log included one column to capture the subject of the telephone calls. The Voting Section plans to take several actions to address voting irregularities for the November 2004 election, including, among other things, using a telephone log similar to the one used for the November 2002 election. The Voting Section did not provide written instructions to contractors for completing the telephone logs related to the 2000 election. However, for the November 2002 federal election, the Voting Section provided instructions to DOJ staff for how to handle calls from citizens, the press, members of Congress, and others. In addition to its method for recording and documenting telephone calls received regarding voting irregularities, we found that the Voting Section did not routinely track its election-monitoring activities through its ICM system. The Voting Section said that it has plans to assign one identification number to track these activities in the future. (See enc. I for more information.)

In conclusion, lack of specifics about allegations and actions limits DOJ's ability to have accurate and clear information to share with the public or Congress about the types of allegations received and actions taken. Predictions of another close presidential election in November 2004 combined with possible voter confusion over new requirements in the Help America Vote Act—such as the implementation of provisional voting in states that had not previously used provisional voting—and possible questions regarding voting equipment could result in the Voting Section again receiving a very large number of telephone calls. This could result in the need to use contractors to record voter allegations because much of the Voting Section staff will be monitoring election sites on election day. It is important that the information collected be as complete, accurate, and specific as possible regarding specific allegations. If the Voting Section collects more precise information about voter allegations, it is in a better position to assure the public that it has addressed allegations of voting irregularities. Moreover, if it documents actions taken more precisely, it is better able to reassure the public and Congress of its commitment to enforce federal voting rights statutes.

The Voting Section emphasized the importance of its monitoring of election-day activities, but the monitoring program has not been routinely tracked in the Voting Section's ICM system. We believe the significance of this program warrants a more formal tracking of monitoring efforts and resources dedicated to the program to allow for reliable, relevant, and timely information for management decision making and for external reporting purposes.

Recommendations for Executive Action

Confidence in our election processes is of utmost importance. To help ensure confidence in the integrity of voting processes, the Voting Section plays an important role in addressing voting irregularities. By accurately recording and documenting its activities in as clear a manner as possible, the Voting Section contributes to assuring the public and Congress of the integrity of our voting processes and that allegations of voting irregularities have been addressed.

To reassure citizens of the integrity of our election processes and to reassure the public and Congress of DOJ's commitment to its responsibility to enforce federal voting rights statutes, we recommend that the Attorney General direct the Chief of the Voting Section to take the following two actions

- develop and implement procedures for the November 2004 election to help ensure that the Voting Section has a reliable method of tracking and documenting allegations of voting irregularities and actions taken to address them. Procedures could include more precise categories to record types of allegations and actions taken; development of instructions on completing the telephone logs; and development and implementation of training for contractors, should they be needed; and
- implement a method to track and report on election-monitoring activities in the ICM system.

Agency Comments

We provided a draft of this report to DOJ for review and comment. The draft report sent to DOJ for comment reflected changes made as a result of DOJ's prior detailed review of attachment IV in enclosure I and changes DOJ requested in writing following our exit conference with them. In commenting on the draft, DOJ generally agreed with the report and recommendations. The Deputy Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division accepted both recommendations and said that the Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division has directed their implementation.

In commenting on our recommendation for the Civil Rights Division to track and report on election-monitoring activities in the ICM system, DOJ noted that it currently has procedures that effectively track election-monitoring activities. Our report acknowledges that the Division had information on election monitoring. However, the Voting Section told us that they did not routinely track election-monitoring activities in the ICM system—its formal process for tracking and managing work activities. Because we had asked for clarification of the confusing and unclear information previously provided on election monitoring and tracking, the Civil Rights Division, in a May 25, 2004, written response provided clarifying information that explained the different databases and data from logs that were used to capture information on election monitoring. In this written response, the Civil Rights Division included four charts on election monitoring that had been recently created, one for each calendar year from 2000 through 2003 (but not for 2004, as the Division states it did). In addition, the Civil Rights Division said that it had asked for a program that would provide the types of reports and data that the Division is routinely asked to provide regarding the election-monitoring program. Our recommendation is directed toward improving the Voting Section's tracking of election-monitoring activities, which the Voting Section has emphasized as being a very important part of its efforts to help ensure voter access to the polls. Tracking election-monitoring activities in the ICM system would ensure that this important component of the Voting Section's work is incorporated into the Division's formal process for tracking and managing work activities.

After we provided DOJ with a copy of the draft report that included this correspondence and its enclosure for review and comment, Civil Rights Division officials realized they had not provided us with information on all of the telephone logs used following the November 2000 election. The Civil Rights Division subsequently provided that additional information, which showed that Voting Section staff used two additional types of logs for the November 2000 election. These logs included columns to record callers' names, telephone numbers, states, and descriptions of the calls. This new information was incorporated into our report to accurately reflect the Voting Section's activities to track telephone calls following the November 2000 election. (See p. 5 in this letter and p. 42 in enc. I.) According to the Civil Rights Division, the November 2002 log, which it proposes as the basis for documenting telephone calls related to the upcoming November 2004 elections, was the only one used by Voting Section staff for the November 2002 election.

DOJ noted that the draft report discussion of the Civil Rights Division's use of telephone logs focused almost exclusively on the logs maintained by contractors, that the draft report failed to note that these logs were only a small portion of all the records of telephone calls received by the Division, and that any shortcomings in these logs were extremely unlikely to have changed the course of subsequent investigations. As we note in our report, it was difficult to obtain precise information on the number of calls or the specific nature of alleged irregularities from the telephone logs on the November 2000 election. The information that the Voting Section collected on its telephone logs was not precise enough to support the Division's statements that upwards of 95 percent of the calls received regarding the November 2000 election reflected citizen frustration or anger over the election, that the vast majority of the calls that contractors received came from New York and California, or that the vast majority of the calls from those two states expressed frustration over the situation in Florida. Moreover, it is important to note that our recommendation with regard to recording complaints about voting irregularities for the November 2004 election is based on the limitations of the log used in November 2002 and the lack of a clear plan for accurately recording a potentially large volume of complaints that may arise from the November 2004 election. For example, November 2004 will be the first national election in which all states will be implementing HAVA's new voter identification and provisional voting requirements with which many voters may be unfamiliar.

In its comments, DOJ said that the Civil Rights Division invited us to meet with Voting Section staff who worked during the time of the November 2000 election and that we declined this invitation. We did not receive an invitation from officials in the Civil Rights Division, who arranged our meetings with Voting Section staff, to meet to discuss the November 2000 election logs. Throughout this review, we requested meetings with Voting Section and Civil Rights Division officials. It is always our preference, as part of our work, to meet with agency officials to discuss issues and questions we may have about agency processes, procedures, and documentation. However, Civil Rights Division officials preferred that we provide questions in writing and to respond to those questions in writing. The Civil Rights Division sometimes took weeks to respond in writing, which contributed significantly to the length of time it took us to complete our review. Had Civil Rights Division officials been more willing to meet with us to explain the Voting Section's processes and discuss the documentation provided to us, rather than rely on written questions and responses, the time required for this review could have been significantly reduced.

DOJ's written comments are in attachment V. DOJ also provided technical comments from the Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section and from the Civil Rights Division, which we incorporated as appropriate. The Civil Rights Division provided additional information on cases initiated for calendar years 2002, 2003, and 2004. The 2002 and 2003 cases involved enforcement under Sections 2 and 208 of the Voting Rights Act and were not clearly identifiable in the ICM system as also involving language minority issues under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act. The Civil Rights Division subsequently identified these cases as including enforcement of language minority violations, and we have included them in our report. Information on cases initiated in calendar year 2004 had not been included because our review covered complete calendar years, but we have added information on cases initiated in 2004 as of August 2004 as a courtesy to the Division.

As agreed with your offices, unless you publicly release its contents earlier, we plan no further distribution of this report until 30 days from its issue date. At that time, we will send copies of this report to the Attorney General, Department of Justice; Chairman, Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs; Chairman, House Committee on Government Reform; Chairman, House Committee on the Judiciary; Chairman and Ranking Minority Member, House Committee on House Administration; and Chairman and Ranking Minority Member, Senate Committee on Rules and Administration. Copies of this report will be made available to other interested parties upon request. This report will also be available on GAO's Web site at <http://www.gao.gov>. Enclosure I

	Objectives
This briefing addresses the following objectives:
<ol style="list-style-type: none">1. Identify and describe any changes the Department of Justice (DOJ) has made since November 2000 to help ensure voter access to the polls. 2. Identify and describe any actions that the Voting Section in DOJ's Civil Rights Division has taken to track (monitoring work initiated and actions taken), address, and assess allegations of election-related voting irregularities received between November 2000 and December 2003.<ul style="list-style-type: none">• Election-related refers to a preliminary investigation, matter, or case that the Voting Section initiated pursuant to an allegation about a specific election.

	Results in Brief
<ol style="list-style-type: none">1. Since November 2000, DOJ has increased its monitoring of election activities on election day, provided additional training to Assistant U.S. Attorneys on civil rights laws, placed a greater priority on protecting the voting rights of language minorities and overseas voters, and provided guidance to states regarding implementation of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA).2. The Civil Rights Division tracks matters and cases through a case management system. Telephone calls related to the 2000 and 2002 federal elections were tracked using telephone logs. The Voting Section addressed allegations of voting irregularities by contacting cognizant officials, obtaining data if deemed appropriate, and assessing the merits of the allegation to determine what, if any, further action was needed.3. The Voting Section tracked the unprecedented volume of telephone calls related to the November 2000 election by using logs. Some logs had several broad categories to capture the subject of the calls and rows for states from which the calls originated, while other logs contained callers' names, contact information, and description of the calls. The Voting Section improved upon the telephone log for the November 2002 election by including categories to capture the action taken on each call and to record the caller's name, telephone number, and subject of the call. The Voting Section tracked some monitoring of elections by assigning matter identification numbers.

Methodology
Objective 1

To identify changes in DOJ's efforts to help ensure voter access to the polls, we

- gathered documentation on DOJ's efforts to
 - monitor and observe elections,
 - increase emphasis on enforcement of minority language and overseas voters' rights,
 - disseminate election-related guidance, and
 - increase its resources to address voting issues, and

- interviewed responsible officials primarily in DOJ's Voting Section and PIN.

Enclosure 1

Methodology
Objective 2

To identify DOJ's actions to track, address, and assess allegations of voting irregularities, we

- interviewed officials in the Voting Section about procedures for tracking, addressing, and assessing allegations of voting irregularities;
- analyzed information on the approximately 11,000 reported telephone calls made to the Voting Section about the November 2000 election; and
- reviewed all files that the Voting Section identified as those it considered to be election-related voting irregularities that were initiated from November 2000 to December 2003. This included 1 closed preliminary investigation, 25 closed matters, and 8 closed and open cases. The Voting Section tracks its matters and cases based on statutes it enforces and not on whether an allegation relates to a specific election. Consequently, the Voting Section had to identify for us the preliminary investigation, matters, and cases that it considered to be election-related voting irregularities.

Voting Section

Enclosure I

Background
Voting Section

Voting Section responsibilities include:

- enforcing the Voting Rights Act, which is designed to safeguard the right to vote of racial and language minorities and illiterate persons, among other provisions;
- enforcing federal statutes designed to safeguard the right to vote of disabled, elderly, military, and overseas voters; and
- enforcing provisions of the National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) which address issues such as voter registration, provisional voting, and voter information.

Attachment I provides more information on statutes that the Voting Section enforces.

Enclosure 1

Background
Voting Section

The Voting Section, among other things, monitors election-day activities to ensure voting rights are protected and initiates investigations and opens matters to examine allegations of voting irregularities that fall within the jurisdiction of the Civil Rights Division. If warranted, a matter may culminate in a case that is filed with a federal court.

Voting Section attorneys are generally responsible for conducting investigations and prosecuting civil cases. The Voting Section also may initiate matters to monitor private lawsuits.

The Voting Section coordinates with the Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section (PIN) to help ensure voters' rights are protected, such as referring three allegations to PIN about possible election crimes related to the 2002 election. (See attach. II for more information about PIN's election-related responsibilities.)

According to Voting Section officials, the number of matters was higher in 2002 because the Voting Section initiated new matters for each of the over 80 newly covered jurisdictions required by the Voting Rights Act to provide bilingual election materials and assistance to language minority citizens. Following the 2000 Census, DOJ, in conjunction with the U.S. Census Bureau, identified these 80 jurisdictions. The Voting Rights Act requires jurisdictions to provide language minority assistance when certain criteria are met, such as when more than 5 percent of the citizens of voting age, or more than 10,000 of the citizens of voting age, are members of a single language minority group, and are unable to speak or understand English adequately enough to participate in the electoral process.

The number of authorized and on-board attorneys declined at the end of fiscal year 2003 because the number of submissions to the Voting Section for redistricting changes following the 2000 Census began to decline that year, according to Voting Section officials. Every 10 years, after the federal census, states redraw their legislative election districts to make these districts equal in population. The process of drawing new election district boundaries is called redistricting.

Enclosure I

Changes to Help Ensure Voter Access
Emphasis Placed on Election Monitoring

In March 2001, the Attorney General announced that DOJ was placing more emphasis on its election-monitoring program. The Attorney General is authorized by law to notify the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) of the need to assign federal observers to monitor polling place activities on election day in counties that the Attorney General has certified under the Voting Rights Act and in counties authorized by federal court orders. The Attorney General delegates the authority with respect to federal observers to the Voting Section. The Voting Section's decision to request federal observers is based on past experience or investigations that indicated observers may be needed to protect voting rights. (See attach. I for information on the law authorizing federal observers.)

In addition to OPM federal observers, the Voting Section assigns DOJ attorneys and professional staff to monitor election day activities in local jurisdictions throughout the United States, whether or not the locations have been certified under the Voting Rights Act. This additional monitoring is part of the Voting Section's investigations of possible voting rights violations. Unlike OPM observers, DOJ attorneys and professional staff do not have specific statutory right of access to polling places and must get authority from the appropriate state and/or local officials for them to enter polling places.

DOJ attorneys and professional staff are assigned to these jurisdictions when there may be insufficient time to arrange for federal observers in covered jurisdictions, or when the results of Voting Section staff's pre-election investigations indicate the need for some limited federal presence.

The Attorney General directed the Voting Section to increase resources devoted to the election-monitoring program through the use of OPM federal observers and DOJ attorneys and professional staff.

The level of resources used and number of elections monitored were greater in federal election years (even-numbered years) than other years, as shown in the next figure.

Changes to Help Ensure Voter Access

OPM federal observers are always accompanied by DOJ attorneys and professional staff when monitoring elections and were present for elections held during calendar years 2000 through 2003 in Attorney General-certified and court-ordered counties and jurisdictions in several states. In a few instances, DOJ attorneys and professional staff independently monitored elections in these Attorney General-certified and court-ordered counties and jurisdictions.

DOJ attorneys and professional staff also independently monitored elections in counties and jurisdictions that were not Attorney General-certified or under court order during this 4-year period. In 2000, DOJ attorneys and professional staff monitored elections in 5 counties in 5 states. By 2002, the number of election jurisdictions monitored by DOJ attorneys and professional staff increased to 19 counties in 10 states, with monitoring of elections in counties in Florida accounting for the bulk of the increase.

According to the Voting Section, election monitoring is a high-priority program of DOJ and a very important part of the Section's efforts to address voting irregularities.

See attachment III for more information on election monitoring in Attorney General-certified and court-ordered election jurisdictions and election jurisdictions that DOJ monitored independently.

Training

Officials in the Voting Section and PIN said that Assistant U.S. Attorneys can attend annual public corruption conferences, where they receive (1) training on handling election crime investigations and prosecutions and (2) periodic updates to DOJ's manual on prosecuting election crimes. Starting in October 2002, additional annual training, referred to as the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Conference, was provided to Assistant U.S. Attorneys who, in coordination with DOJ headquarters, handle election-related matters for the 93 U.S. Attorneys.

The Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Conference training, according to Civil Rights Division officials, included civil rights issues that had not been covered in the training offered to Assistant U.S. Attorneys prior to October 2002 and was designed to provide them a better understanding of what the Voting Section does to enforce federal voting rights statutes. Also, according to the Civil Rights Division, the presentations that the Voting Section made at this annual training conference placed special emphasis on the election-monitoring program and solicited the Assistant U.S. Attorneys' involvement in helping to enforce federal voting rights laws, ballot access, and the election-monitoring program. According to PIN, this training, which was mandatory for the Assistant U.S. Attorneys designated as district election officers, also covers voting integrity issues important to election crime matters.

Contacts with State and Local Election Officials

In October 2002, the Attorney General directed each U.S. Attorney to coordinate with state and local election and law enforcement officials prior to the November 2002 elections to, in part, explore ways that they could work more closely together to deter and detect discrimination and to deter and prosecute election crimes.

According to PIN officials, the Attorney General's October 2002 directive (1) formalized an ad-hoc practice that had existed in DOJ for many years of coordinating elections and election-related matters with state officials and (2) led to a systematic effort to coordinate election issues and matters with these officials.

Prior to the November 2002 federal elections, almost all of the U.S. Attorney Offices reported to PIN that they had contacted various state or local officials either by telephone, in writing, or in person.

The state and local officials contacted varied by each U.S. Attorney Office. For example, according to PIN,

- the three U.S. Attorneys in the state of Florida reported having met with the Florida Secretary of State and
- the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of California reported having met with the San Diego County Registrar of Voters, Election Administrator, and Deputy District Attorney, and the Imperial County Registrar of Voters and District Attorney.

	Changes to Help Ensure Voter Access Language Minority Voting Rights
In 2002, the Civil Rights Division made enforcement of voting rights laws that address access to voting for language minority groups one of the Voting Section's highest priorities. DOJ reported in a civil rights accomplishments fact sheet that the Civil Rights Division conducted an outreach campaign with state and local election officials and local language minority groups to help ensure access to bilingual voting materials for language minority groups. This was begun in July 2002 following the certification of covered jurisdictions based on the results of the 2000 census. <ul style="list-style-type: none">• The fact sheet states that the outreach included a July 2002 letter from the then- Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division to each of the 296 political jurisdictions covered by Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act notifying them of their bilingual access obligations in the upcoming and future elections. According to the Civil Rights Division, attorneys from the Division visited many of the 296 counties covered by Section 203.• In addition, the fact sheet reported that Civil Rights Division attorneys conducted in-person meetings with state and local election officials and local language minority groups in almost all of the more than 80 newly covered jurisdictions.

We analyzed data as of March 15, 2004, on matters and cases related to Section 203 language minority issues recorded in DOJ's Interactive Case Management (ICM) system, which is used to track and manage these data. We found that the Voting Section initiated 7 matters and no cases in 2000, 13 matters and 2 cases in 2001, 94 matters and 1 case in 2002, and 28 matters and no cases in 2003. According to the Civil Rights Division, the Division also initiated the following cases: (1) two language assistance cases in 2002 under Section 2 and Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act; (2) two cases in 2003 under Section 2, Section 203, and Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act; and (3) five cases in 2004 under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act. Sections 2, 203, and 208 of the Voting Rights Act are described in attachment I.

Uniformed and Overseas Citizens

Given the large number of troops deployed overseas and an increase in concerns about late mailing of absentee ballots, Voting Section officials said that the Voting Section placed increased priority in 2004 on enforcing and preparing to ensure compliance with the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act (UOCAVA), which only applies to federal elections. These officials cited the following enforcement and preparation activities during 2004.

- Obtained a court order in April for emergency relief to remedy an UOCAVA violation committed during the Pennsylvania primary election.
- Negotiated with the state of Alabama in May to obtain a similar emergency relief order from a state court for a county's failure to provide enough time for the mailing and return of ballots from overseas voters for its primary election.
- Obtained a court order in an UOCAVA lawsuit in July against the state of Georgia for similar emergency relief for its primary election.
- Established a working group of Voting Section attorneys to facilitate communications with the Department of Defense's Federal Voting Assistance Program, which is charged with administering UOCAVA, and to plan for the possibility of more UOCAVA litigation during 2004.

Our analysis of matters and cases in DOJ's ICM system as of March 15, 2004, showed that the Voting Section initiated 3 matters and 2 cases during calendar years 2000 through 2003 involving the issue of absentee voting by uniformed and overseas citizens. All 5 of the matters and cases were initiated in 2002.

Guidance to States on HAVA

In October 2002, HAVA established the Election Assistance Commission to, in part, serve as a national clearinghouse and resource to compile information and review procedures related to federal election administration and provide guidance on implementing certain HAVA requirements. Because the Election Assistance Commission was not established until December 2003, the Voting Section provided informal, nonbinding guidance to states on implementing the requirements of HAVA.

The Voting Section's guidance to states on HAVA's requirements included

- interpreting requirements of the law and advising states on how to comply with them based on DOJ's enforcement role under HAVA;
- responding to inquiries from state and local officials;
- making presentations at various meetings and conferences;
- writing letters to the chief state election official, governor, and attorney general in each of the 50 states, the District of Columbia, and the U.S. territories offering to assist the jurisdictions in their efforts to ensure compliance with HAVA and summarizing HAVA provisions;
- creating a HAVA information page on its Web site; and
- issuing a press release that outlined provisions of HAVA that took effect on January 1, 2004, such as provisional voting and identification requirements for new voters who register by mail.

According to the Civil Rights Division, the Voting Section also filed its first enforcement action in California in 2004 against a county for violating the voter information provisions of HAVA.

In our review of files, we found that Voting Section attorneys generally addressed allegations of voting irregularities initiated from November 2000 to December 2003 through a preliminary investigation or investigative matters and took actions such as interviewing election officials at state and local levels, interviewing voters affected by alleged voting irregularities, and meeting with civil rights groups.
Our review of Voting Section files also found that Voting Section attorneys, in conjunction with supervisory attorneys, assessed information collected and determined whether (1) federal voting rights laws were violated; (2) an investigation should be closed, or (3) further action was needed by the Voting Section, such as filing a complaint with a federal court or continued monitoring.

Tracking Allegations of Voting Irregularities

The ICM is a database system that the Voting Section uses to track and manage matter and case data for the Section and can be used to generate reports.

Each matter and case is assigned a DJ number, which is a unique identification number. Information on matters and cases can be searched by the identification numbers, statutes, and other information maintained in the system.

The system is set up to automatically enter certain data and has required fields for which data must be entered. Voting Section staff can enter other data into the system, as appropriate.

Tracking Allegations of Voting Irregularities
Officials told us that the Voting Section

- receives numerous citizen calls, comments, and questions daily;
- receives telephone calls, e-mails, faxes, letters, and packages. Most of the calls and written allegations from citizens do not concern issues within the jurisdiction of the Civil Rights Division and, in such instances, the caller is often notified of this determination over the telephone and referred to other state or federal agencies with possible jurisdiction;
- documented telephone calls received at the Section's toll free telephone number using telephone logs for the 2000 and 2002 elections;
- found that only a small percentage of allegations that it received following the November 2000 election fell within its jurisdiction or presented substantive issues that merited further review. Notations on logs documenting telephone calls related to the November 2000 election indicated that some of the calls— we were unable to quantify the number of calls because of the way calls were recorded— were related to dissatisfaction with the outcome of the election or other issues such as general complaints about the election process that contained no specific allegations of violations of federal laws;
- in addition to following up with people who called the Voting Section after the November 2000 election, Voting Section staff pursued other avenues of complaints, such as complaint logs generated by the NAACP Voter Fund, hearings conducted by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and the NAACP, and incidents receiving a large amount of publicity, to determine if federal laws had been violated; and
- expects attorneys to find new matters for investigation in addition to assignments made by Section management.

Voting Section officials told us that on election day

- in addition to calls received by the Section at its toll-free number, an OPM federal examiner maintains a toll-free telephone number to receive calls. An examiner is a federal employee assigned by OPM to receive complaints of racial or minority language discriminatory voting practices. (See attach. I for the statute related to federal examiners.) Any allegations taken by the examiner that are deemed to require immediate attention are routed to the Civil Rights Division when received, while other allegations are transmitted after the election and reviewed to determine if further action is needed. According to the Chief of the Voting Section, they received few, if any, allegations from examiners in relation to the November 2000 election, and
- a small number of Civil Rights Division staff remain available at the Voting Section on major election days to take citizen calls, with the vast majority of Section staff at various locations around the country for monitoring purposes. Major problems that arise from these calls are routed to attorney supervisors to determine what actions are needed.

Our review of files included five matters that were initiated to monitor elections. According to Voting Section officials, this activity is not routinely tracked through the ICM, but they plan to designate a single identification number to track this activity.

Actions to Track, Address, and Assess Allegations
Actions to Address Allegations

The following presents information on the Voting Section's process for addressing allegations related to voting irregularities.

- If the Voting Section deems that a voting allegation falls within its jurisdiction and appears to have merit, an attorney is assigned to make inquiries about the allegation. The attorney performs some investigative work to determine whether the allegation should be pursued.
- If an attorney believes a matter should be investigated, the attorney discusses this with the Deputy Chief responsible for the state in which the matter rises. The Section Chief and Deputies decide whether or not to formally open a matter. The Voting Section assigns a number to the matter for tracking purposes.
- When Voting Section staff monitor elections and receive allegations of or information about voting irregularities while on site, they make efforts to resolve allegations by contacting local election officials immediately. Further investigation of such irregularities is conducted after an election if the allegation was not resolved on election day or if it is deemed otherwise necessary to prevent such problems from arising in the future.

	Assessment of Internal Controls Results in Brief
In our review, we found that <ul style="list-style-type: none">• the Voting Section tracked telephone calls related to the November 2000 election by using telephone logs. Some logs had several broad categories to capture the subject of the calls, rows for states from which the calls originated and, for the most part, tabulated the numbers of calls using tick marks. Other logs that the Voting Section used contained information such as callers' names, telephone numbers, and descriptions of the calls. The Voting Section improved upon the telephone log for the November 2002 election by including columns to record the action taken on each call in addition to recording the caller's name and telephone number, but has one column to capture the subject of the call, and• as mentioned previously, the Voting Section tracked some monitoring of elections by opening matters and assigning each matter an identification number. According to Voting Section officials, it has not routinely tracked election-monitoring activities through the case management system but is considering assigning one identification number to track election-monitoring activities.

Enclosure I

Assessment of Internal Controls
November 2000 Election Telephone Logs

The Voting Section received an unprecedented volume of telephone calls in November and December 2000 related to the unusual events surrounding the November 2000 presidential election.

- The Voting Section reported to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary that it received approximately 11,000 calls related to the November 2000 election. In comparison, the Voting Section told us it received several hundred calls related to the November 2002 election. The Voting Section told us it does not have records of telephone calls related to other elections except to the extent that such telephone calls generated investigations that became matters or cases.
- According to the Voting Section, contractors were hired in November 2000 to help handle the unprecedented number of incoming telephone calls received concerning the November 2000 election to help ensure that the public would be able to voice opinions and concerns. Hiring contractors was not intended as a mechanism to gather specific allegations.
- Voting Section staff and contractors kept telephone logs that consisted of tables with columns identifying broad categories of allegations or comments and rows with the state from which a call originated. Voting Section staff also kept two other types of logs, which included the caller's name, state, telephone number, and description of the call. Calls were recorded on most logs as tick marks, while some logs included limited narrative on the nature of the call.

Enclosure I

Assessment of Internal Controls

Our analysis of the telephone call logs completed by contractors found the following:

- It was difficult to count how many calls were received because, for example, one caller could have made multiple complaints and some logs appeared to be duplicates.
- The call logs did not include a way to record calls from 4 states—Arkansas, Kansas, Montana, and North Dakota. According to Voting Section officials, these 4 states were left off the contractor logs inadvertently, although these officials noted that they were unaware of any calls received from these states. Our analysis found that Voting Section staff recorded having received calls from some of these states.
- Columns that were used to record callers were labeled voter fraud, irregularities, request investigation, re-vote, and general comments. In some of the logs, the columns were re-labeled manually to tally additional types of comments. The broad nature of these column labels to record information about the nature of the calls and the limited narrative sometimes included on logs did not always provide sufficient information to determine whether the Voting Section should initiate an investigation.
- The telephone logs did not include information on callers' contact information such as telephone numbers.

Assessment of Internal Controls
November 2000 Election Telephone Logs

Some of the telephone logs that Voting Section and contractor staff completed included comments indicating allegations that people may have been prevented from voting. According to the Voting Section, Voting Section personnel reviewed logs on an ongoing basis and efforts were made to contact callers who provided telephone numbers and whose messages indicated possible violations of federal civil rights statutes. The Voting Section does not have records indicating how many such return calls were made and noted that return telephone contact information was not always provided or asked for.

According to Voting Section officials, an assessment of the calls led them to determine that most of the calls focused on concerns about the election situation in Florida, often from citizens in states other than Florida, and that few allegations included substantive information about possible violations of federal law. However, the information on the November 2000 telephone logs is not precise enough to document this assessment.

For the November 2002 federal election, the Voting Section assigned staff to receive calls; provided instructions for how to handle calls from citizens, the press, members of Congress, and others; and provided state contact information to refer callers to state officials, when appropriate.

According to Voting Section officials, a telephone log was used to record calls received. The telephone log included columns to record time of call; caller information for name, city, state, and telephone number; subject; and action. No instructions were provided with the telephone log about how to complete it regarding the type of information to be included in the subject or action columns.

The Division noted that the November 2002 log or any log that the Voting Section might use for the November 2004 election is a tool to ensure that the Voting Section does not miss calls raising important concerns over which it has jurisdiction and is not intended to definitively track all election-related allegations received.

The Civil Rights Division also cited other procedures that the Voting Section plans to use to track and respond to possible telephone calls related to the November 2004 general election. These procedures will include the Voting Section

- continuing its practice of assigning its staff to specific states for the purpose of reviewing citizen calls and letters;
- keeping a sufficient number of staff and supervisory attorneys in headquarters on election day to handle calls and to respond to allegations referred from Voting Section staff monitoring elections in the field on that day; and
- using contractors, if needed, to take telephone calls. The Division plans to determine the need to use contractors on a case-by-case basis.

<ul style="list-style-type: none">• The Voting Section received an unprecedented number of calls related to the November 2000 election and took steps to document telephone calls. According to the Voting Section, it also documented calls for the November 2002 election for which far fewer calls were received. The 2000 and 2002 election telephone logs differed somewhat in format, and improvements were made regarding how information was collected on the 2002 election telephone log. The Voting Section did not provide written instructions to contractors in November 2000 about how to complete the logs, but did provide written instructions to DOJ staff on completing some of the information for the 2002 logs. However, both logs lack precision for documenting the nature of the call and actions taken because broad categories were used to capture information on the call.

Conclusions

- Predictions of another close presidential election in November 2004, possible voter confusion over new requirements in the Help America Vote Act, and possible questions regarding voting equipment could result in the Voting Section again receiving a large number of telephone calls and possibly result in the use of contractors to handle calls since most of the Voting Section staff are monitoring election sites on election day. If the Voting Section collects more precise information about such calls, it is in a better position to assure the public that it addressed allegations of voting irregularities; if it documents actions taken more precisely, it is better able to reassure the public and Congress of its commitment to enforce federal voting rights statutes.
- The Voting Section has emphasized the importance of its monitoring of election day activities, yet the monitoring program has not been routinely tracked in the ICM system, its formal process for tracking and managing work activities. Voting Section officials told us they were considering tracking this program in the future, and we believe the significance of this program warrants a more formal tracking of monitoring efforts and resources dedicated to the program.

Attachment IVoting Laws Enforced by the Voting Section Relevant to Contents of Briefing and Its Attachments

According to the Voting Section, to carry out its mission, the Voting Section brings lawsuits against states, counties, cities, and other jurisdictions to remedy denials and abridgements of the right to vote; defends lawsuits that the Voting Rights Act authorizes to be brought against the Attorney General; reviews changes in voting laws and procedures administratively under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act; and monitors election day activities through the assignment of federal observers under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act. Provided below are short descriptions of some of the primary voting laws enforced by the Voting Section.

Voting Rights Act Provisions

- Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 1973)

Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act establishes a nationwide ban against any state or local election practices or procedures that deny or abridge a citizen's right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group.⁴ The Voting Rights Act provides that plaintiffs may establish a violation of Section 2 by demonstrating that "the political processes leading to nomination or election" deny members of the protected classes an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. A court, under the Voting Rights Act, may also consider the extent to which members of the protected class have been elected to office in the jurisdiction, though Congress made clear that Section 2 does not confer upon protected classes a right to proportional representation.

- Sections 203 and 4(f)(4) of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. §§ 1973aa-1a, 1973b(f)(4))

Sections 203 and 4(f)(4) are the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act and require certain covered jurisdictions to provide bilingual election materials and assistance based on census data pertaining to the population of citizens of voting age with limited English proficiency and their rate of illiteracy. With respect to Section 203, the Voting Rights Act requires jurisdictions to provide language minority assistance when certain criteria are met, such as when more than 5 percent of the citizens of voting age or more than 10,000 of the citizens of voting age are members of a single language minority group, and are unable to speak or understand English adequately enough to participate in the electoral process.

Attachment I

- Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-6)

Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act authorizes voting assistance for blind, disabled, or illiterate persons. A voter who requires assistance to vote by reason of blindness, disability, or inability to read or write may be given assistance by a person of the voter's choice, other than the voter's employer or agent of that employer or officer or agent of the voter's union.

- Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 1973c)

Under Section 5 of the Act, "covered"⁴ jurisdictions may not change their election practices or procedures until they obtain federal "preclearance" for the change. The act provides for either judicial or administrative preclearance. Under the judicial mechanism, covered jurisdictions may seek declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that the change has neither the purpose nor the effect of discriminating against protected minorities in exercising their voting rights. Under the administrative mechanism, covered jurisdictions may seek the same determination from the Attorney General. The Attorney General may deny preclearance by interposing and objection to the proposed change within 60 days of its submission.

- Section 6 of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 1973d)

Section 6 of the Voting Rights Act provides for the appointment of federal examiners by order of a federal court or, with respect to certain covered jurisdictions, upon certification by the Attorney General. Federal examiners help to register voters by determining whether a citizen meets state eligibility requirements and must therefore be included in the registration rolls. A federal court, under the Voting Rights Act, may order the appointment of federal examiners to any jurisdiction sued under any statute to enforce certain constitutional voting guarantees.⁵ In covered jurisdictions, the Attorney General may appoint examiners upon certification that the Attorney General has received at least 20 meritorious written complaints of voting discrimination or that the Attorney General otherwise believes that the appointment of examiners is necessary to protect voting rights.

⁵ See also, section 3 of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 1973a).

Attachment I

- Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 1973f)

Under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act, federal observers may be appointed, upon request of the Attorney General, in any jurisdiction where an examiner is serving. Federal observers are to monitor elections and report whether persons entitled to vote were allowed to vote and whether their votes were properly counted.

- Section 11(b) of the Voting Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 1973i(b))

Section 11(b) of the Voting Rights Act prohibits persons, whether acting under color of law or not, from intimidating, threatening, or coercing, or attempting to intimidate, threaten or coerce, any person for voting or attempting to vote. Section 11(b) further prohibits intimidation, threats, or coercion of those persons aiding other persons in voting or exercising certain powers or duties under the Act.

Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act of 1986 (42 U.S.C. §§ 1973ff to 1973ff-6)

The Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act of 1986 (UOCAVA), in general, requires states and territories to allow absent uniformed service voters, their spouses and dependents, and certain other overseas voters to register and vote absentee in elections for federal office. UOCAVA requires, for example, that a presidential designee prescribe a federal write-in absentee ballot for all overseas voters in federal elections. The ballot is to be used if the overseas voter applies for, but does not receive, a state absentee ballot.⁷ While state law, in general, governs the processing of these federal write-in ballots, UOCAVA requires that states permit their use in federal elections.⁸

National Voter Registration Act (42 U.S.C. §§ 1973gg to 1973gg-10)

The National Voter Registration Act of 1993 (NVRA) established procedures designed to "increase the number of eligible citizens who register to vote in elections Federal office," while protecting "the integrity of the electoral process" and ensuring the maintenance of "accurate and current voter registration rolls."⁹ NVRA requires all states to adopt certain federal voter registration procedures, except for those states that have no registration requirements or that permit election-day registration with respect to federal elections.¹⁰ NVRA, for example, requires states to allow applicants for driver's licenses to register to vote on the same form.¹¹ NVRA also requires states to provide voter registration forms and accept completed applications at various state agencies, including any office in the state providing public assistance, any office in the state that provides state-funded disability programs, and other agencies chosen by the state, such as state licensing bureaus, county clerks' offices, public schools and public libraries.¹² NVRA also contains detailed requirements regarding state removal of names from federal registration rolls.¹³

Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act of 1984 (42 U.S.C. §§ 1973ee to 1973ee-6)

Congress has passed legislation intended to improve access for elderly and handicapped individuals to registration facilities and polling places for federal elections. The Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act of 1984 requires, with some exceptions, that political subdivisions within each state that are responsible for conducting elections assure that polling places and registration sites are accessible to handicapped and elderly voters.¹⁴ If the political subdivision is unable to provide an accessible polling place, it must provide an alternative means for casting a ballot on election day upon advance request by the voter.¹⁵ The act's requirements also include, for example, that each state or political subdivision provide a reasonable number of accessible permanent registration facilities, and that each state make available certain types of voting and registration aids such as large-type instructions and information by telecommunication devices for the deaf.¹⁶

Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (42 U.S.C. §§ 12131 to 12134) (enforced by the Disability Rights Section of the Civil Rights Division)

Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act prohibits discrimination against qualified individuals with disabilities in all programs, activities, and services of public entities. It applies to all state and local governments, their departments and agencies, and any other instrumentalities or special purpose districts of State and local governments. According to the Voting Section, as construed by the courts, Title II requires that polling places be accessible to persons with disabilities with certain exceptions.

Help America Vote Act (42 U.S.C. §§ 15301 to 15646)

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA), among other things, established a program to provide funds to states to replace punch card voting systems, established the Election Assistance Commission to assist in the administration of federal elections and to otherwise provide assistance with the administration of certain

Attachment II

Role of the Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section in Federal Elections

The Public Integrity Section (PIN), in conjunction with the 93 U. S. Attorneys and the FBI, is responsible for enforcing federal criminal laws applicable to federal election fraud offenses, among other things. Election fraud is conduct that corrupts the electoral processes for: (1) obtaining, marking, or tabulating ballots; (2) canvassing and certifying election results; or (3) registering voters. Election fraud can be committed with or without the participation of voters. Examples of election fraud that does not involve voter participation are ballot box stuffing, ghost voting, and "nursing home" frauds. Examples of election fraud that involves, at least to some extent, voter participation are vote buying schemes, absentee ballot fraud, voter intimidation schemes, migratory-voting or floating-voter schemes, and voter "assistance" fraud in which the voters' wishes are ignored or not sought. According to a PIN official, its attorneys spend about 10 percent of their time on election fraud investigations and trials.

PIN is also responsible for overseeing the U.S. Attorneys' and the FBI's investigation and prosecution of federal election fraud, one of the most common types of alleged federal election crimes. PIN's oversight entails (1) advising investigators and prosecutors on the application of federal criminal laws to election crimes, (2) reviewing all major election crime investigations and all proposed election crime charges, and (3) assisting with implementing DOJ's District Election Officer (DEO) program. Under the DEO program, PIN asks each of the 93 U.S. Attorneys to appoint an Assistant U.S. Attorney to serve a 2-year term as a DEO and provides training and guidance to DEOs on carrying out their responsibilities. DEOs, whose responsibilities are performed in conjunction with their other responsibilities, are to

- screen and conduct preliminary investigations of complaints, in conjunction with the FBI and PIN, to determine whether they constitute potential election crimes and should become matters for investigation;
- oversee the investigation and prosecution of election fraud and other election crimes in their districts;
- coordinate their district's (investigative and prosecutorial) efforts with DOJ headquarters prosecutors;
- coordinate election matters with state and local election and law enforcement officials and make them aware of their availability to assist with election-related matters;
- issue press releases to the public announcing the names and telephone numbers of DOJ and FBI officials to contact on election day with complaints about voting or election irregularities and answer telephones on election day to receive these complaints; and
- supervise a team of Assistant U.S. Attorneys and FBI special agents who are appointed to handle election-related allegations while the polls are open on election day.

Attachment II

Our analysis of information from PIN on election fraud matters showed that U.S. Attorneys and PIN attorneys initiated a total of 61 election fraud matters, or investigations, related to election years 2000 through 2003. Most of the 61 matters related to elections held in 2002. Matters were initiated in 28 states and 1 U.S. territory (the U.S. Virgin Islands) and ranged from 1 to 7 matters per state/territory over the 4-year period. The most frequent allegations of election fraud were for absentee ballot fraud and vote buying. According to PIN, many of these matters resulted in indictments and subsequent convictions.

According to the Criminal Division, the information provided by PIN does not include all election fraud investigations that the U.S. Attorneys have initiated because (1) U. S. Attorneys are not required to consult with PIN for preliminary investigations as opposed to grand jury investigations, which require consultation; (2) PIN did not track election fraud investigations prior to October 2002; and (3) election fraud investigations are sometimes initiated under non-election statutes.

*For the matters that the Voting Section initiated in Florida after the 2000 election, the Voting Section initially used a general DJ number for all work on investigations and inquiries related to the Florida election. This number was opened in November 2000. Subsequently, the Voting Section assigned separate DJ numbers for individual matters. The 2000 matters in Florida and Hillsborough County, Florida, were inadvertently not given an individual DJ number.

Summary of Election-Related Closed Matters and Open Case Initiated during November or December 2000

Description based on Voting Section information	Voting Section's actions taken to address allegation	Voting Section's assessment of allegations	Disposition by Voting Section
1. The Voting Section received a large number of complaints alleging that Florida voters arrived at the polls expecting to be properly registered to vote, but were told that their names were not on the voter rolls. Some people who tried to vote but whose names were not on the voter rolls were often told to stand in another line so election officials could be called to verify their registrations, but many voters alleged that office phones were busy all day and registrations could not be verified. Some voters apparently left and some remained at the polls until they were apparently told they could not vote because the polls were closed.	Voting Section staff contacted individuals mentioned in complaints that the NAACP had forwarded to determine the nature of their alleged registration problems. Voting Section staff monitored election-related hearings and lawsuits in Florida to see what steps the state was going to take. The Voting Section reviewed election reform legislation that Florida enacted in 2001.	Interviews by Voting Section staff with individuals mentioned in the complaints did not reveal a distinct pattern of registration problems in any one Florida county sufficient to warrant litigation, but taken as a whole the registration complaints seemed to indicate general problems with the state of compliance with NVRA provisions for clarity and processing of voter registration forms, transmission of the forms to election officials, education of registration personnel, adherence to NVRA registration deadlines, maintenance of registration lists, ability to verify registration at the polls, and education of voters, state registration personnel, election officials, and poll workers.	Florida enacted election reform legislation in 2001 requiring, among other things, that the state implement a statewide voter registration database, permit provisional voting, and provide funds to counties for voter education and poll worker training. The Voting Section reviewed this law under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act and precleared it on March 28, 2002. With respect to this investigation, the Voting Section noted that these reforms should help address the problems alleged to have occurred in 2000. While the Voting Section further noted that the

Attachment IV

			new state legislation did not appear specifically to address all the NVRA-related issues, such as the voter registration process and education of motor vehicle agency and other state agency employees regarding state registration procedures and requirements in federal law, such issues could be addressed through design and implementation of the forthcoming election procedures to carry out the requirements of the new law. Therefore, the Voting Section determined that it would monitor Florida's NVRA actions in the future in light of the new state legislation and ongoing federal legislative efforts in election reform which might also impact Florida's election procedures. The Voting Section closed the matter because, based on its monitoring of the situation and the provisions in the state law pertinent to registration that had been precleared, it concluded that the problems which occurred in the 2000 election were being adequately addressed.
2. The NAACP National Voter Fund alleged (1) that on Election Day 2000, sheriff's deputies in marked cars in Hillsborough County, Florida, blocked access to a polling place, (2) that their presence	Voting Section staff met with, among others, officials from the county sheriff's office and several local residents, and spoke with a poll watcher to gather additional	The sheriff's office reported that the presence of sheriff's deputies near the polling place was related to a burglary nearby. A poll worker observed the presence of the sheriff's cars around the same time they were responding to the burglary, and observed that no voter had been deterred from voting due to the police activity.	allegations raised.
3. It was alleged that the design of the butterfly ballot in Palm Beach County, Florida, violated federal voting rights laws.	The Voting Section opened a matter related to this issue and reviewed federal law for which the Section had enforcement authority to determine if any action was appropriate.	The Voting Section determined that there was no basis for asserting federal jurisdiction.	The Voting Section concluded that because it had no jurisdiction concerning this matter, no further action was warranted. In addition, according to the Voting Section, the new Florida election reform law should help to alleviate faulty ballot design by providing for greater oversight of ballot design.
4. Four state troopers with the Florida Department of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles ran a driver's license checkpoint on Election Day 2000 in Leon County, Florida. This checkpoint was located near (about a mile from) a voting precinct. Another checkpoint was held in Bay and Escambia Counties. According to a highway patrol official, this checkpoint was not located near a voting precinct.	The Voting Section opened a matter to investigate this issue and asked the Florida State Office of the Attorney General about the checkpoint in Leon County. A Voting Section attorney also spoke with an African-American voter who was stopped at one of the driver's license checkpoints.	The Voting Section's investigation revealed that the Florida Highway Patrol had set up a traffic check stop close to a polling place (about a mile away) located in a predominantly African-American neighborhood. The Voting Section investigation also indicated that the troopers' traffic stop plan had not been pre-approved by their commander, as is the standard procedure. Further investigation revealed that the traffic checkpoint was in effect for about 3 hours, and a higher number of white drivers were stopped than African-American drivers. According to the Voting Section, an African-American voter who was	The Voting Section closed the matter because there was no evidence of intimidation or racial intent to affect or intimidate voters.

		stopped was treated courteously and proceeded to vote without incident.

		persons could not identify the precincts where alleged irregularities occurred, and that they did not have allegations of racial intimidation or vote suppression. The Voting Section attorney determined that their complaints seemed to concern Georgia state law, suggested that they explore their state law remedies, suggested that they contact the county elections department and the office of Georgia's Secretary of State, and asked them to keep the Voting Section attorney informed of developments.
6. The Voting Section received information that people in Gwinnett County, Georgia who had registered to vote via the Georgia Department of Public Safety (DPS) were not on the voter registration rolls and were not allowed to vote. DPS operated vehicle registration sites in Georgia. Subsequently, DPS began the process of transitioning National Voter Registration Act (NVRA) responsibilities to the state's newly created Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV). It was alleged that voters were turned away from the polls and were not offered provisional ballots. Some voters were told to go to the county registration office, but officials there told them they were not allowed to vote.	The Voting Section spoke with staff in the Georgia Attorney General's office and the Georgia DPS and DMV, a voter who raised the allegations, and the Deputy Director of Elections in the Secretary of State's Office. The Voting Section monitored the transition of NVRA responsibilities from DPS to the new DMV from April 2001 to April 2002.	The Voting Section's investigation revealed that the problem likely arose from the DPS paperless system to obtain and renew a driver's license. The process seemed to result in people believing they had been registered to vote when they had not. A person who indicated the intention to register to vote did not receive any confirmation at the time of the transaction. The Voting Section's investigation revealed that since DPS implemented a paperless system in 1996, the percentage of those who registered to vote at DPS sites when they applied or renewed their licenses had dropped almost every year. There was also evidence that DPS officials knew of concerns regarding the agency's paperless registration system from its implementation.	The Voting Section closed the matter in April 2002 mostly because the state had created a new agency, the Department of Motor Vehicle Safety, to which responsibility for voter registration was in the process of being transitioned. The Voting Section determined this system would remedy the problem.
7. DOJ, on behalf of the United States, alleged that the St. Louis Board of Election Commissioners' (referred to hereafter as the Board) placement of eligible voters on	Following an investigation, DOJ filed a complaint with the U.S. District Court in the Eastern District of Missouri on August 14, 2002. inactive status, when combined with election-day procedures that inactive voters were required to follow to restore their active voter status and vote during the November 2000 and March 2001 elections, constituted a removal of those voters from the voter registration rolls in violation of Section 8 of NVRA. As of the November 2000 general election, more than 54,000 registered voters in St. Louis had been designated as inactive and excluded from the lists of eligible voters following a series of mail canvasses that the Board conducted of its voter registration rolls. These mail canvasses did not include the notices required by Section 8(d)(2) of NVRA. The Board did not make an effort to notify inactive voters that their registration status had changed, that their names would not appear on the voter registration lists, or that they would face more administrative efforts on election day before being permitted to vote. As a result, certain eligible, but inactive voters, were not able to vote in the November 2000 general election and March 2001 municipal primary election due to the lack of an adequate infrastructure (i.e., insufficient phone lines, working telephones, and staff) in place to enable voters to complete the verification procedures required by the Board on election day. For the November 2000 election, over 300 eligible inactive voters were able to obtain authorization to vote after going to the Board's headquarters as instructed by the election judges.	DOJ entered into a consent order with the city of St. Louis.		requires the Board to initiate procedures to remedy the problems that occurred during the November 2000 election, such as improved methods of notifying voters who are moved to an inactive status, improved methods of canvassing, and improved resources to process eligible voters not included on the rolls on Election Day. This relief included requiring that every polling place have a complete list of registered voters, including inactive voters, and a polling place locator to assist voters in finding their correct precincts. The consent decree is valid until January 31, 2005. The case remains open to monitor implementation of the consent order.

Summary of Election-Related Closed Matters and Open Cases Initiated during Calendar Year 2001
Description based on Voting Section Information	Voting Section's actions taken to address allegation	Voting Section's assessment of allegations	Disposition by Voting Section
1. There were allegations made by students at Florida A&M University (FAMU) in Tallahassee (Leon County), Florida, and Bethune-Cookman College in Daytona Beach, Florida, regarding discriminatory treatment of African-American students in the registration process or at the polls. First-time voters, apparently unfamiliar with the registration process, had greater difficulty registering to vote. Older students did not seem to have such difficulty.	The Voting Section's investigation consisted of phone interviews with Bethune-Cookman students, on-campus interviews of FAMU students and student government leaders, and a review of statements taken by a representative of the Service Employees International Union legal department working in association with the NAACP. A Voting Section attorney interviewed three students on FAMU's campus who claimed to experience difficulty voting, but were able to vote. The Voting Section attorney left his contact information with FAMU's student government association for any individuals who wanted to give statements regarding voting problems but could not meet with the attorney. The Voting Section attorney attempted to contact all ten students from Bethune-Cookman, but was only able to speak with three. The attorney sent letters to the remaining students but never received responses to the letters. The Voting Section attorney followed up with his contacts at FAMU, but the Voting Section did not receive any response from students to its efforts to conduct further inquiries. The student government association	The Voting Section determined that the problems were likely attributable to voter confusion, not racial animosity. The Voting Section noted that the incidents of the three FAMU students who successfully voted were isolated incidents, and since each student ultimately voted, the problems they suggested did not suggest a pattern of intimidation or attempted vote denial. The Voting Section concluded that most of the allegations were likely to have been the result of students not being familiar with the voting process. Many students had registered at their permanent home addresses and did not understand they had to re-register in Leon County. The Voting Section found that voter inexperience and confusion were to blame at Bethune-Cookman, not any pattern of discriminatory treatment.	The Voting Section closed the matter because it lacked merit based on the evidence gathered during the investigation.

	also posted and distributed flyers and sent out internet notices with the attorney's contact information. Neither the attorney nor the student association at FAMU received additional allegations of voting irregularities.
2. Beginning in 1999, under Florida state law, the state contracted with a firm to compare names of registered voters with names of convicted felons who under Florida law were disqualified from voting. The state elections division sent lists of felon names for each of Florida's 67 counties to election officials in those counties for investigation and purging. The Voting Section was concerned that county and state actions with regards to the purging process may have been flawed and impermissible under NVRA. The Voting Section questioned whether eligible voters had been inadvertently removed from the voter rolls.	The Voting Section reviewed testimony from Florida election officials and representatives of the company that compiled the database and obtained information on how the lists of felons' names were matched to voter registration lists. The Voting Section also did extensive additional investigation to determine whether the method in which Florida compiled a list of felons and how they purged these felons violated any of the statutes enforced by the Voting Section. In addition, the Voting Section reviewed Florida's 2001 election reform law pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. This review included provisions of the new law related to the voter purge procedures that were the subject of the investigation.	The evidence gathered by the Voting Section showed that the matching at the state level was set up in a way that it captured names that were less than definite matches. The Voting Section also learned that after receiving the state-generated list, counties' actions varied. For example, some counties refused to use the list because they perceived it to contain many errors. Other counties sent letters to all the people on the state's list telling them that their names were matched to those of disqualified felons, and they would be required to show their eligibility to vote or be removed from the rolls. The Voting Section determined that evidence gathered for this matter was inconclusive, but showed there was a possibility that voters could have been removed in violation of federal law. With respect to the Section 5 review of the 2001 election reform law, this law was precleared on March 28, 2002 after careful review. Preclearance was granted only after receiving explicit assurances from the Attorney General of Florida describing how the law would be implemented with respect to voter purge lists.	The Voting Section closed the matter in April 2002. The closing memo noted that the new statute appears to require no additional procedures for accurate name matching compared to the old law. It also noted that the new statute appeared to codify a procedure used by many counties under prior law where voters whose names are matched by the state must affirmatively prove their eligibility to avoid removal. However, the Voting Section closing memo also noted that the new voter purge procedures (which included the assurances made by the Attorney General of Florida to protect voters from erroneous purging) had been precleared on March 28, 2002. It further stated that the Florida felon purge statute in effect at the time of the 2000 election no longer existed and that any litigation against it based on how that law was implemented would be moot. Based on these two factors, the matter was closed. The memo also stated that the Voting Section may open a new investigation depending on any information received regarding the operation of the new statute and related regulations. Finally, the closing memo

		generated by the state pursuant to the new state law. These assurances included (1) a statement that there would not be a presumption in favor of the accuracy of the statewide database, and any presumption would be in favor of the voter and (2) the appearance of a voter's name on any voter purge list of potentially ineligible voters generated by the state would not by itself confirm a voter's ineligibility, and that the burden of determining ineligibility was on county supervisors of elections, a burden which must meet the highest degree of proof. These assurances were specifically noted when preclearance was issued by the Voting Section.	also made note of pending litigation in the case of NAACP v. Harris, which included allegations that the voter purge list used in 2000 violated the NVRA. Subsequent to the April 2002 closing of this matter, a settlement was reached in this case which required new procedures for how the state was to complete its voter purge lists in the future. This change in voter purging procedures was precleared under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act in 2003.

spoiled ballots in Florida during the November 2000 election. The Commission questioned whether the racial disparity in spoiled ballots that occurred in Florida in 2000 was a violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. The Commission stated that the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) should specifically investigate whether the racial disparity in spoiled ballots violated Section 2.	rejection disparity and several newspaper studies of the spoilage issue. It then prepared a factual and legal analysis of issues raised in the Commission's report to determine if a Section 2 violation had occurred.	of a few Florida counties during one election. However, the Voting Section determined that the disparity alone did not meet the standards for a Section 2 lawsuit. The Voting Section noted that more investigation, analysis, and careful thought would have to be given to the causes of ballot rejection problems in Florida, the actual level of racial disparities, and the role played by state and county officials before a decision could be made concerning a Section 2 violation.	Florida on the basis of the evidence of racial disparities found in spoilage rates. Furthermore, it was determined that because Florida's 2001 election reform law required new election machines, significant steps had been taken by Florida towards remedying the election problems with respect to voting machines. The Voting Section also concluded that it would make sense to monitor the actions of Florida and its counties over the subsequent few years to see whether they would follow through in acquiring new voting machines with error detection technologies and educating voters to see what impact such actions would have on ballot rejection rates.
5. DOJ received allegations of inaccessible polling places and voting booths in Broward County, Florida.	The Voting Section opened a matter and looked into the county's compliance with the Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act (VAEHA). The Voting Section sent a letter to the Broward County Supervisor of Elections requesting specific information regarding procedures in place to ensure the physical accessibility of polling places for federal elections pursuant to VAEHA. Attorneys from the Voting Section and the Civil Rights Division's Disability Rights Section met with the county supervisor of elections and the supervisor's attorney to discuss physical accessibility of polling places and	Based on information that the county provided, the Voting Section found that the county conducted polling place surveys in 1999 and conducted another survey devised to address the problem of disabled voters' access to the polls. The investigation revealed that the people conducting the surveys had no training in accessibility standards. The county provided the Voting Section attorney with a memo and a plan stating that Florida intended to purchase new touch-screen voting machines with an audio component for the blind or visually impaired, with one such voting machine available per precinct.	As a result of the problems experienced in the 2000 election, the Florida legislature enacted changes to its accessibility requirements for polling places and voting machines. In light of this and the Voting Section's determination that the new Florida law went further than the requirements in VAEHA, the investigation was closed.

The Voting Section and Disability Rights Section's attorneys requested documentation such as copies of county surveys covering accessibility procedures, a list of polling place changes spurred by accessibility concerns; a list of disability community contacts with whom officials from the office of the county supervisor of elections met, and procedures for reassignment or curbside voting. The county provided both attorneys with a demonstration of the new touch-screen voting machines with an audio component for the blind or visually impaired. The Voting Section attorney also contacted the county supervisor of election's attorney requesting information on VAEHA compliance.
6. It was alleged that a crowd of persons attempted to intimidate election officials on the canvassing board of Miami-Dade County, Florida, during the presidential vote recount after the November 2000 election. 8. The Voting Section opened this matter in August 2001 to initiate the monitoring of an election in New York City in November 2001 on the basis of observations made during the November 2000 election. Thirty federal observers and seven DOJ staff members monitored polling place procedures during municipal general elections in 2001 in Kings County (also known as Brooklyn) and in Bronx County. The Attorney General had previously certified both counties for federal observers pursuant to Section 6 of the Voting Rights Act. Also, 17 federal observers and 5 Voting Section attorneys monitored polling place procedures during the general election in 2002 in Brooklyn.	In pre-election activities, two Civil Rights Division attorneys met with officials from the New York City Board of Elections to discuss concerns about preparations for the election, including the need for poll worker training for the election, the need for voting machines to accommodate the number of registered voters, the need for Spanish-language voter registration materials for poll workers to distribute minority language assistance, and consolidation of polling places. A Voting Section attorney also attended four poll-worker training classes. After the election, the Voting Section attorneys met with several Board of Elections officials to debrief them.	Thirty federal observers monitored activities at 31 polling places in Bronx County and 12 polling places in Brooklyn County during the municipal general elections. Three staff members from DOJ's Civil Rights Division and one ALUSA for the Southern District of New York traveled with the observers to provide additional monitoring. Two Voting Section staff members visited six polling places in both counties. During the election, observers found that materials to be displayed to inform Spanish-speaking voters of assistance to interpret the ballot were not always clear or in public view at nearly half of the polling places in both counties. The Board of Election officials were informed of this and took action. These officials noted that it was up to each polling place inspector to display the materials they are given. Poll workers were observed asking voters for identification, which was in violation of New York State law. Board of Election officials were notified of this and went to the polling place to address the issue. DOJ monitors did not witness any Spanish-speaking poll workers at the 12	The Voting Section closed the matter because the monitoring of the election was completed. Voting Section staff could not comprehensively identify failure by individual poll workers to post or provide all materials to Spanish-speaking voters because of the large number of election districts—nearly 2,000—and the small number of observers. However, the Voting Section found that the Board of Elections was very responsive to all of the Voting Section's concerns and sent Board officials to places where problems arose, usually within 30 minutes.

9. The Voting Section received an allegation from an African-American voter that a supervisor at a voting precinct in Georgetown County, South Carolina, discriminated against African-American voters during the 2000 presidential election. The voter alleged that the supervisor treated African-American voters in a rude and discriminating manner. In talking to the complainant and others, it was learned that there were also alleged voter registration problems during the 2000 election related to precinct changes and the local DMV.	The Voting Section attorney interviewed officials with the Georgetown County Board of Registration and Elections, representatives of the Republican and Democratic parties, voters, and an attorney representing the county. In addition, in the interview with the employee in the local DMV office, the Voting Section attorney learned that they may have been only asking people applying for new drivers' licenses, not people renewing their licenses, if they wanted to register to vote. However, this employee further informed the Voting Section attorney that in October 2000 she received instructions from the head of the state DMV to ask every person who was applying for a driver's license whether he or she wished to register to vote, and she followed that instruction through the election.	voting precincts was likely the result of a change in the method of identifying addresses of voters. With respect to allegations about the DMV procedures, the Voting Section received no complaints from voters who indicated that the alleged problems at the DMV existed or resulted in denying them the right to vote. In addition, after the examination of the DMV forms and interview with the local DMV employee, it was concluded that there did not appear to be a violation of the NVRA.

11. During the November 2000 election, Miami-Dade County, Florida, allegedly engaged in practices that prevented the county's Creole-speaking Haitian-American voters with limited ability to speak English from securing assistance at the polls. In circumstances where the county permitted voter assistance from persons of the voters' choice, the scope of the assistance was limited (e.g., standing next to voters during poll worker demonstrations) and of little value to voters once they entered the voting booths.	After a full investigation, the Voting Section initiated litigation against Miami-Dade County because of its alleged violation of Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act. Prior to initiating litigation, the Voting Section conducted an investigation of the county's voter assistance practices during the 2000 election. DOJ filed a complaint with the U.S. District Court in the Southern District for Florida on June 7, 2002.	Evidence gathered during the investigation demonstrated that Creole-speaking Haitian-American voters at several precincts were denied assistance from persons of their choice in violation of Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act. Oftentimes, only poll workers, who did not speak Creole, were permitted to assist the voters, and they limited their assistance to voter demonstrations outside the voting booths. The Voting Section did not find evidence that noncompliance with Section 208 was the result of intentional discrimination. In this regard, it was noted that the Miami-Dade Board of County Commissioners passed ordinances in 1999 and 2000 mandating that Haitian-Creole ballot translations be available in voting booths located at precincts where "significant" numbers of Haitian-American people vote.	A consent order was entered into on June 17, 2002, that, in part, prohibited the county from denying Haitian-American voters assistance from persons of their choice and mandated that the county take certain steps to prevent violations of Section 208 and to redress the harm caused those voters, such as modifying poll worker training to include instruction on how to handle requests for language assistance. The consent order is in effect through December 31, 2005. The case is open to monitor implementation of the consent order.
12. As described in DOJ's complaint, DOJ alleged that various election practices and procedures in Orange County, Florida, unlawfully denied or abridged the voting rights of Spanish-speaking citizens. The challenged practices concerned the alleged failure of the county to: (1) provide an	After investigating these allegations, DOJ filed a complaint in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida on June 28, 2002, and entered into a consent decree with Orange County on October 9, 2002.	In the complaint, the Voting Section alleged that Orange County violated VRA Sections 203 and 208.	The case is open to monitor implementation of the consent decree. The consent decree permits DOJ to monitor elections in Orange County from October 9, 2002 until January 31, 2005. The consent decree also mandates policies and procedures that Orange County must adopt with

The consent decree is valid until January 31, 2005. DOJ did not contend that Orange County's failure to adhere to VRA Sections 203 and 208 was the result of intentional discrimination.
13. As described in DOJ's complaint, DOJ alleged that Osceola County, Florida, engaged in various election practices and procedures that unlawfully denied Spanish-speaking citizens an opportunity equal to that of other citizens to vote. The challenged practices concerned: (1) the failure of poll officials to communicate effectively to Spanish-speaking voters necessary information concerning their eligibility to vote, voter registration status, identification requirements, and polling place changes and assignments; (2) the refusal of poll officials to allow certain Spanish-speaking voters assistance in voting by persons of their choice; and (3) hostile remarks by poll officials directed towards Hispanic voters with limited English proficiency.	After investigating the matter, DOJ filed a complaint in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida on June 28, 2002, and entered into a consent decree with Osceola County on July 22, 2002.	In the complaint, the Voting Section alleged that Osceola County violated VRA Sections 2 and 208.	The case is open to monitor implementation of the consent decree. The consent decree allows DOJ to monitor elections held in Osceola County from the date of the consent decree through January 31, 2005. It specifies procedures that the Osceola County Board of Elections must implement with regards to the treatment of Spanish-speaking voters and efforts the county must engage in to facilitate voting by Spanish-speaking voters. The consent decree is valid through January 31, 2005. DOJ did not contend that Osceola County intended to deny Spanish-speaking voters an equal opportunity to participate in the political process.

15. As described in DOJ's complaint, DOJ alleged that the state of Tennessee engaged in practices that unlawfully denied certain citizens full and complete opportunities to register to vote in elections for federal office as mandated by NVRA. The challenged practices included the failure of the state and agency officials to: (1) provide applications to register to vote simultaneously with applications for motor vehicle driver's licenses (including renewal applications); (2) request only the minimum amount of information necessary to prevent duplicate voter registration and enable state election officials to assess the eligibility of the applicant and to administer voter registration and other part	After investigating this matter, DOJ filed a complaint against the state of Tennessee in the U.S. District Court of Tennessee on September 27, 2002. On that same day, the state of Tennessee entered into a consent decree with DOJ.	In the complaint, the Voting Section alleged that Tennessee violated provisions in NVRA.	The case is open to monitor implementation of the consent decree. The consent decree requires the state and state agencies to develop uniform procedures with regards to the voter application process and the implementation of NVRA and report progress to DOJ annually while the consent decree is in effect. Summary of Election-Related Closed Preliminary Investigation and Matters and Closed Cases Initiated during Calendar Year 2002

Description based on Voting Section information	Voting Section's actions taken to address allegation	Voting Section's assessment of allegations	Disposition by Voting Section
1. The wife of a soldier from Hinds County, Mississippi, assigned to Guantanamo, Cuba, alleged that her husband and approximately 50 other soldiers from that county did not receive their absentee ballots in the mail. Hinds County acknowledged receiving their requests in mid-September of 2002, and the circuit clerk confirmed they were mailed in the first week of October 2002. The Mississippi Secretary of State's office suggested that the soldiers fax in federal ballots but was not sure the ballots would be counted. That office also suggested to the soldier's wife that she contact the Voting Section. She reported to the Voting Section that soldiers from Madison and Rankin counties, also in Mississippi, did not receive their ballots until after the election. She also contacted the Assistant U.S. Attorney (AUSA) for Hinds County.	A Voting Section official discussed the allegation with an official in the Federal Voting Assistance Program (FVAP) under the Department of Defense (DOD), who said that someone in Hinds County told FVAP on November 20, 2002, that about 20 ballots had been sent to soldiers in Guantanamo. Voting Section staff also phoned the AUSA in Jackson, Mississippi, and noted in a memo that the AUSA had directed a local Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) agent to interview the chancery clerk, the registrar, and all others in the chain of custody of the ballots. The Voting Section also discussed asking FVAP to monitor transit of absentee ballots to soldiers from Hinds and Brandon Counties.	The AUSA told the soldier's wife that an investigation revealed the ballots had been lost in the mail. The FBI agent concluded that the county officials had mailed the ballots to the soldiers, but they had been lost or disappeared. The private company that processed mail for the county told the FBI agent that they were unable to check the zip codes of mail processed on a particular day.	The Voting Section closed the preliminary investigation after the AUSA concluded, and the Voting Section agreed, that there was no basis for bringing charges against anyone involved in the handling of the ballots because the ballots had been lost in the mail and no further action was needed.

	during the next election in response to the soldier's wife January 2003 request that the Voting Section keep these counties on its "radar screen."
2. On November 5, 2002, federal election observers and Voting Section staff monitored polling place activities at 21 locations in Apache and Navajo Counties, Arizona. The Attorney General, pursuant to VRA Section 6, had certified these counties for federal observers. Since then, federal observers have documented problems related to the counties' inability to provide consistently effective Navajo language assistance to voters and other related circumstances affecting the Navajo voting population. The Voting Section was concerned about the following issues related to the primary held in September 10, 2002, and the general election held in November 5, 2002: (1) the counties' provision for Navajo language assistance, (2) voters being turned away at the polls, (3) crossover voting, and (4) polls not opening on time. During the 2000 election cycle and 2002 primary, federal observers documented several problems with the counties' provision of Navajo language assistance to voters. The Voting Section suggested that both counties distribute cassette tapes containing Navajo language ballot translations to poll workers. The counties committed to preparing and distributing the tapes to poll workers. Officials from both counties also informed the Voting Section that they would use updated flip charts for the November election. These charts, which were used for the September primary at the Voting Section's suggestion, displayed pictorial representations and written Navajo translations of each of the offices on the primary election ballot. There had been confusion in previous elections among many	In September 2002, the Voting Section met with the Apache County Election Director, the Apache County Deputy County Attorney, the Navajo County Election Director, the Navajo County recorder, and two Navajo County outreach workers to discuss several issues related to elections in the two counties. The Voting Section provided suggestions on how to prevent prior problems from recurring. The Voting Section observed the November 2002 election. The original poll worker training schedules that the two counties had provided to the Voting Section allotted approximately 2 hours for training. The Voting Section suggested having all-day training sessions, and the schedules were revised to allot 6-8 hours for training. The Voting Section suggested that both counties provide each polling place on the Navajo Reservation with voter registration lists from both counties, and train poll workers to check both lists and check with the appropriate county election department before turning voters away. Both counties agreed to adopt this suggestion. The Voting	The counties' implementation of their Navajo Language election information program was inadequate. While the counties provided language assistance to many voters, the assistance was frequently insufficient and failed to provide consistent and accurate language translation of the offices and propositions on the ballot's 14 propositions. The Voting Section concluded that the counties must improve and expand their training program for interpreters. The federal observers reported that the interpreters and poll workers believed more training in Navajo language translation was necessary. Some poll workers told the observers that the audiotapes containing Navajo translations were too long and confusing. One polling place was not well organized, resulting in very long lines. The Voting Section reported this to the Navajo County Elections Director, who sent an outreach worker to remedy the problem. The line was moving more quickly by mid-afternoon. The number of voters turned away from the polls was less than during the September	A November 22, 2002, memo discussing the monitoring of the November 5, 2002, election indicated that the Voting Section would meet in the future with election officials from both counties to discuss the November 5, 2002, election and develop methods to improve the counties' provision of language assistance and overall Election Day performance. The matter was closed after the election. According to the Voting Section, this is standard Voting Section procedure when irregularities are observed during election coverage. In the case of Navajo language assistance in these counties, the Voting Section stated that such outreach has been continuous for many years. Another memo discussing compliance and outreach efforts since the 2002 election indicates many improvements in Navajo language assistance efforts as a result of this outreach, including: (1) improved poll worker training which included the use of pictorial flip charts to assist voters in

elderly Navajo voters who live near the Navajo/Apache county line about polling place and voter registration. These voters often vote in different locations for tribal and state/federal elections. Tribal elections do not recognize county boundaries. Poll workers at polling places near the county line apparently turned away dozens of elderly voters because of voting location confusion during the 2000 primary and general elections and the 2002 primary. In 2000, poll workers gave affidavit ballots to other crossover voters in the mistaken belief that the ballots would be accepted later. However, since these voters were not registered in the counties where they voted, their votes were considered invalid.	Section also expressed concern about polling places that opened late for the September primary. However, while all the polling places had both counties' registration books, poll workers at most locations did not use them. Some did not know the books were available. At one Apache County location, observers reported that the Navajo county list was not present. The Voting Section informed the county elections director, who showed the Navajo County book to the polling place inspector. The poll workers had not removed the book from the elections supply box. The Voting Section felt that more training and practice would make the poll workers more familiar with this new system. There were no complaints about polls not opening on time.	understanding the ballot; (2) outreach and voter registration efforts on the reservation at various events; (3) the opening of new early voting locations on the Navajo Reservation; (4) the opening of a new satellite election office on the reservation to disseminate voter information and register voters; and (5) greater cooperation among the counties providing Navajo language assistance.
3. Voting Section personnel and 2 AUSAs monitored 84 precincts in Broward County, Florida, during the November 2002 election.	Actions taken by DOJ staff included interviewing the clerk of the precinct where a white male precinct worker who allegedly harassed African-American voters was employed about any complaints or problems with the assistant precinct clerk in question. DOJ staff spoke with four voters at this precinct regarding their experience voting and asked election officials to make chairs available for the disabled and elderly waiting in line to vote. They contacted county election officials about a voter who was told he could not vote because he had already sent an absentee ballot, the precinct clerk eventually verified that the voter	Voting Section staff provided assistance to help correct issues that arose during the monitoring. Examples of issues/problems observed were: (1) African-American voters felt somewhat harassed by a white male precinct worker; (2) a poll official did not want to allow a person to vote who said he had requested an absentee ballot but did not receive it; and (3) persons were turned away because of precinct changes due to redistricting, because they moved, and for other reasons.	The Voting Section closed the matter because the election being monitored was completed.

In addition, DOJ staff: (1) gave a voter the toll-free telephone number for the Voting Section because the voter wanted to complain about the lack of voting machines; (2) asked a poll clerk and poll workers if they had received complaints about not having enough voting machines; and (3) spoke with two voters who complained about a precinct being hard to find.
4. At the request of Florida's Secretary of State, the Voting Section monitored the election in November 2002 in Duval County, Florida.	Voting Section attorneys monitored the election and facilitated the resolution of problems that arose by communicating proper election procedures to the Supervisor of Elections. Prior to monitoring the election, Voting Section attorneys met with the Supervisor of Elections, minority leaders in the community, leaders of the NAACP, and representatives from the local Democratic and Republican parties. They exchanged telephone information and invited each person or group to contact them with details of any problems that they might help address. They also provided guidance on issues that might arise to provide a	While monitoring the election, the Voting Section found various areas of clarification and improvement. One issue involved absentee ballots and Florida law allowing a person who requested an absentee ballot but did not submit it to vote at the polls. There was confusion when absentee ballots were submitted but rejected as being incomplete because they lacked voters' signatures and voters then being able to vote at the polls. Voters who submit absentee ballots are considered to have voted and cannot vote at the polls on election day if the absentee ballot is rejected. Also, poll workers had given incorrect ballots to	The Voting Section closed the matter because the election being monitored was completed.

5. Georgia state law requires counties to have absentee ballots on hand 45 days before a general election. Georgia missed the September 20, 2002, deadline for the November 5, 2002, general election because of the compressed election schedule in 2002. The 45-day deadline was set to comply with federal mandates to make it easier for U.S. military personnel stationed outside the United States to vote. Georgia had compressed its 2002 primary and runoff election schedules such that the runoff was held only 49 days before the November 5 general election. This precluded the printing of the general election ballot in time for the mailing deadline required under state law. Georgia election officials had contacted FVAP during the first week of October regarding the state's compliance with the Uniformed and Overseas Citizen Absentee Voting Act (UOCAVA). Catoosa County ballots omitted the names of the Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate and the Republican gubernatorial candidate from the ballot. An allegation was made that this, among other absentee ballot irregularities, violated UOCAVA because the correct ballots, even if sent at the time this concern was raised on October 18, 2002, would not be received in time. Georgia's Secretary of State asked DOJ to bring suit against the state to extend the deadline for receipt of	FVAP advised the Voting Section that a senior official in Georgia's Elections Division said that election officials in each of Georgia's counties would photocopy all necessary ballots and send them to every military and overseas citizen absentee voter from whom an application had been received in time. military and other absentee ballots. 6. The Voting Section conducted an investigation under UOCAVA and monitored a lawsuit in Minnesota over absentee ballots used in the November 2002 general election. At issue was the removal of Senator Paul Wellstone's name on the ballots and issuance of new ballots. Senator Wellstone died 11 days prior to the election, and former Vice President Mondale was designated the replacement candidate for the Democratic-Farmer-Labor party. This party argued for mass mailing of new absentee ballots, and the Republican party argued to do the mailing based on requests.	In an e-mail, the Voting Section attorney expressed concern about ballots being mailed, filled out, and returned between October 31 and November 5 (6 days).	The Voting Section monitored state actions to address this issue.	The Voting Section closed the matter after the state Supreme Court issued an order addressing the absentee ballot issue. 7. A suit arose from the resignation of Senator Robert Torricelli from the general election and ballot for Democratic nomination to the U.S. Senate. The New Jersey Democratic party brought suit to secure a declaration that the New Jersey Democratic State Committee was permitted to select a qualified candidate to replace Sen. Torricelli. The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled in favor of the state Democratic party and required that a new ballot be prepared under the direction of the state Attorney General and a state court judge. Military and overseas ballots were to be given precedence and an explanatory letter was to be sent to all voters who received the new ballots. The Voting Section was concerned about the late transmittal of ballots to military and overseas voters.	The Voting Section prepared a discussion memo evaluating the impact that the New Jersey Supreme Court ruling would have on overseas absentee voters. In addition, DOD provides a backup ballot available at military installations and U.S. embassies/consulates. This is referred to as a federal write-in absentee ballot. The Voting Section noted that the question might arise regarding how the state would address ballots that had already been transmitted to overseas voters and may have already been returned. 8. An attorney for Bexar County, Texas, requested, in a letter to the Voting Section dated October 18, 2002, expedited review of changes in the county's early voting process in the joint general and special election on November 5, 2002. Changes included: (1) the one-time use of two-page ballots for partisan contested races, (2) procedures for counting ballots with straight-party votes, and (3) one-time use of a single two-sided ballot for partisan contested races supplemented by a separate sheet with duplicate voting instructions for the November 5, 2002, general election. Prior to that request, the League of United Latin American Citizens filed suit in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas alleging that Bexar County implemented changes to the conduct of the November general election without obtaining preclearance from DOJ.	The Chief of the Voting Section wrote a letter back to the attorney for Bexar County. The court agreed with both parties that the changes were required and allowed the changes to proceed pending the preclearance. On October 31, 2002, the court decided to retain jurisdiction over the case through the conclusion of the 2002 election process and ordered the parties to advise the court as to their positions on the case on or before December 1, 2002.	The Voting Section closed the matter because it granted preclearance for the changes.

9. A U.S. Representative sent a letter to the Attorney General regarding possible voter suppression in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, New Jersey, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, and Texas. In Arkansas, Louisiana, and Maryland, it was alleged that African-Americans were victims of voter suppression. In New Jersey and Texas, allegations of voter suppression involved Hispanics. The victims of voter suppression in the other states were not specified. According to the Voting Section, many of the matters referred to in the letter were matters under the jurisdiction of the Criminal Division and were being investigated by that Division when the letter was received. The Voting Section investigated two of the allegations referred to in the letter, including one in Hidalgo County, Texas, where it was alleged that the Republican party intimidated Hispanic voters countywide to dampen their turnout at the general election. The second allegation that the Voting Section investigated that was referred to in the letter was in New Jersey; the Voting Section opened a matter in 2003 to investigate this allegation (see information provided in this attachment for 2003). The most direct form of alleged intimidation in Hidalgo County was reported to have occurred when two poll watchers for a Republican candidate challenged Hispanic voters at early voting on the basis that a study indicated that 13,000 dead or ineligible voters were in the county's voter registration rolls. The Republican party held a press conference two weeks before the election where party representatives alleged that voter fraud could be a significant problem with the number of people listed incorrectly on the voter rolls.	A Voting Section memo referred to an allegation received from the U.S. Representative regarding possible intimidation at the November 2002 election held in Hidalgo County, Texas. The Voting Section attorney requested several pieces of documentation from the county elections administrator, including newspaper articles, letters between the elections administrator and the Republican elections administrator, and information regarding a study regarding the possibility of 13,000 dead or ineligible voters on the county voter rolls. The Voting Section attorney spoke with Hispanic voters and other minority contacts. The Voting Section attorney also analyzed voter turnout data for Hidalgo County and compared it to the state of Texas for 2002 and previous elections.	The Voting Section determined that Hidalgo County's election administrator handled the situation well by expelling the poll watchers when the voting supervisors alerted the election administrator that two poll watchers for the Republican candidate were making random challenges to Hispanic voters. The Voting Section further determined that efforts on the part of the Republican party did not dampen minority turnout and did not discover instances of voter intimidation at the polls on election day. The Voting Section noted that minority contacts in the county: (1) did not think that the allegations of dead voters on the rolls dampened turnout; (2) did not believe that the challenges made by the two poll watchers caused fewer Hispanic voters to vote; and (3) did not report problems of voter intimidation at the polls. The Voting Section did not find apparent differences between the voter turnout data in the 2002 election compared to other elections.	The Voting Section closed the matter on June 25, 2003, because it lacked merit. The Voting Section attorney observed that there was a tense atmosphere in Hidalgo County between some of the white Republicans and the Hispanic citizenry. The Voting Section recommended that this is an area that should be monitored in future elections.

This included permitting voters to submit write-in ballots if their ballots are not sent to them in time and counting the write-in ballots as valid as long as the voters living outside the United States are qualified to vote in Texas. 1. This matter was the second matter opened by the Voting Section in response to the November 2002 letter from a U.S. Representative referred to in the previously described 2002 matter for Hidalgo County, Texas. There were allegations of voter intimidation in New Jersey. According to a newspaper article, e-mails were sent to Latino lawyers urging them to engage in an aggressive campaign to ensure ballot fairness. Attorneys for both the Democratic and Republican National Committees presented their case before the U.S. district court. The judge ruled a few days before the November 2002 election that there was "nothing sinister" in the Republican ballot fairness plan and characterized the plan as legitimate campaign activity.	The Voting Section attorney contacted a Latino political activist in the New York metropolitan area, the Treasurer of the New Jersey Hispanic Bar Foundation, and a community activist and attorney based in Newark, New Jersey.	The people that the Voting Section attorney contacted were not aware of the e-mail or any other threats or intimidation tactics against Latino voters. The Voting Section noted that its investigation yielded results similar to the judge's findings—that the ballot fairness plan mentioned in the e-mail did not raise concerns about Latino voter intimidation during the November 2002 general election.	The Voting Section closed the matter because it lacked merit.

Comments from the Department of Justice

U.S. Department of Justice
Civil Rights Division

Office of the Deputy Assistant Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

August 27, 2004

William O. Jenkins, Jr.
Director
Homeland Security and Justice Issues
United States Government Accountability Office
Washington, D.C. 20548

Re: Department of Justice's Activities to Address Past Election-Related Voting Irregularities - Draft Report GAO-04-1041R

Dear Mr. Jenkins:

Thank you for providing the Department of Justice with a copy of a draft of the Government Accountability Office (GAO) report entitled "Department of Justice: Activities to Address Past Election-Related Voting Irregularities." This letter constitutes the Justice Department's formal comments, and I request that it be included in the final report.

The Department appreciates the GAO's, and the requesting members', interest in this most important issue. Indeed, of all the areas of responsibility charged to the Civil Rights Division, none ranks more highly than protecting the franchise.

Since 2001, the Division has worked steadily to protect federal voting rights. We have directed substantial resources to implementing the electoral reforms of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 ("HAVA"), including working with all states and territories to facilitate their preparedness to comply with the HAVA provisions that took effect on January 1, 2004. We also have taken unprecedented steps to protect the rights of language minority voters. And we have moved strongly to ensure that all American citizens overseas, including our men and women in uniform, have an opportunity to participate in the democratic process. Finally, as your draft report demonstrates, the Division has significantly increased the numbers of monitors and observers deployed to ensure compliance with federal voting rights. In short, this Division has been fully attentive to the challenge of protecting federal voting rights, and we are gratified to see our successful record reflected in your draft report.

With regard to the specific recommendations your draft report has made, we are pleased to accept both. In the Division's view, each will be a salutary addition to the many steps already taken to improve protections of federal voting rights. For that reason, the Assistant Attorney

Attachment V

General for Civil Rights has already directed implementation of your recommendations.

With regard to the balance of the draft report, we appreciate the opportunity to have worked with GAO personnel on this audit. As with any report on an issue of such a critical nature, it is of the utmost importance that the report be both complete and accurate. Accordingly, we also appreciate the opportunity to provide comments. We must, however, register our disappointment that, while GAO took more than fifteen months to investigate and compile its draft report, you offered the Civil Rights Division only one week to review and comment on the voluminous document. Moreover, when the Division explained the difficulties and potential for error raised by such an abbreviated review, GAO offered just one additional week. This restriction has severely hampered our ability to provide the type of thorough review appropriate to such an important document, a particularly unfortunate consequence given that the draft report fails to capture accurately substantial portions of the Voting Section's work. Nevertheless, we have endeavored to provide as detailed and illuminating a set of comments as possible in the permitted time. Our specific comments follow:

1. Tracking Election Monitoring Activities

First, the GAO recommends establishing within the Department's ICM system a mechanism for tracking and reporting election-monitoring activities. As noted, the Assistant Attorney General has already taken steps to implement this recommendation, and the Division will implement an electronic means of tracking such data.

At the same time, however, it is important that the draft report not leave the reader with the suggestion that the Division presently lacks any system for tracking its election monitoring activities. See Letter at v; Draft Report at 41. This would be incorrect. The Voting Section does currently have procedures that effectively track election monitoring activities. Since the mid-1980s, the Voting Section has maintained logs detailing this information. As your records should show, the Division provided your investigators with a full explanation of these procedures in its May 25 response to your inquiries. The Division also provided you with the actual charts used for this tracking for the years 2000-2004. These charts provide detailed information about the state, the name of the jurisdiction monitored, the date of election, and the number of OFM observers and DOJ personnel who monitored the election. The Voting Section has found this system to be adequate and effective. Moreover, the existing logs are accurate and easily accessible.

2. Incomplete and Outdated Data Regarding Section 203 Work

It is also important that the final report reflect the most up-to-date information possible about the Voting Section's enforcement activities. Specifically, with regard to the Division's enforcement of Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, while the draft report purports to have reviewed data through March 15, 2004, it discusses enforcement of Section 203 only through 2002. See Draft Report at 27. We have previously noted to you that the Division undertook a significant number of additional cases related to Section 203 and language minority issues in 2002, 2003, and 2004. Yet, the draft report fails to mention these. The Division thus respectfully requests that the draft report be corrected to reflect our full record. Specifically, Civil Rights Division attorneys contacted all, and personally visited many of, the 296 counties covered under Section 203 to help guide local election officials in complying with the law's dictates. In 2003, the Division also initiated an additional two lawsuits (one under Section 2 and Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act and one under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act) not reflected in the draft report, and we filed an additional 5 cases in 2004 (each under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act). The cases are referenced in Attachment 1 to this letter. To put this in perspective, the Division has filed as many Section 203 cases since May 2004 as were filed in the previous eight years. Moreover, the cases filed since May 2004 have provided comprehensive minority language election programs to more voters than all previous Section 203 cases combined.

Attachment V

In addition to the foregoing filings, a number of additional jurisdictions voluntarily modified their practices after being contacted by the Division. In this respect, it is important to note a substantial restraint on the Division's authority. The remedies provided under the voting rights laws only provide for prospective relief for violations. In other words, even if the Department's investigation reveals that a particular jurisdiction may have violated the law in the past, if the jurisdiction changes its election procedures to comply with the law so it is no longer in violation, our investigation becomes moot and we cannot litigate to ask for remedies that are no longer needed. Unlike private plaintiffs filing litigation in test cases, the Department cannot obtain relief for past violations that are no longer occurring. This is especially important to keep in mind when reviewing matters in states that passed voting reform legislation changing their election administration.

3. Updated Information on UOCAVA Work

On page 28 of the draft report, the third bullet point about the lawsuit filed in Georgia under the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act of 1986 should be corrected to reflect that a court order was granted:

"Filed. Obtained a court order in an UOCAVA lawsuit in July against the state of Georgia requesting a for similar emergency relief order for its primary election."

4. Updated Information on HAVA Work

On page 29 of the draft report, the summary of the Division's activities under the Help America Vote Act of 2002 fails to mention the first HAVA enforcement action filed by the Voting Section. We respectfully request that the following bullet point be added:

Filed its first enforcement action in California against a county for failing to fully implement HAVA

Attachment V

The case is United States v. Son Berto Cowry, California (N.D. Cal.). A complaint was filed on May 26, 2004 alleging, in addition to a violation of Section 203, a violation of the voter information provisions of HAVA. A consent decree requiring actions by the county to remedy the violations is pending review and approval by the court.

5. Documentation of Complaints of Alleged Election 2000 Voting Irregularities

As the GAO draft report itself notes, "[c]onfidence in our election processes is of utmost importance." Draft Report at vi. Moreover, confidence is assisted by "accurately recording and documenting [election related] activities in as clear a manner as possible." Id. This is no less true for your report as for our record-keeping. Accordingly, it is imperative that the final report accurately captures the full facts surrounding the Division's efforts during the 2000 election. At present, the draft report fails to do so.

Your draft letter to Congress and draft report repeatedly references the Division's documenting of public telephone calls during the 2000 Presidential election. These references may be construed to imply that an alternate means of documenting such public contacts would have enabled the Division to identify the existence of violations of federal law warranting further investigation. It is important that the GAO be clear that it is reaching no such conclusion, because such a conclusion simply would not be accurate.

The chief difficulty in the draft report's summary is its nearly exclusive focus on telephone logs maintained by contractors hired by the Department to record calls coming into the Department's main switchboard in the days after the 2000 election. The draft report contends that these logs were insufficiently detailed. However, the draft report fails to note that these logs made up only a small portion of all of the records of phone calls received by the Division. Therefore, any shortcomings in these logs are extremely unlikely to have changed the course of subsequent investigations.

As we previously advised GAO, (DOJ Response to April 7 Information Request), these contractors were hired to take phone calls from the public only during the weekend following the election, when the Division's offices would normally otherwise have been closed. The Division decided to afford the public this extra service after the Department's main switchboard received thousands of calls from around the country inquiring into the situation in Florida. In addition, the Voting Section's telephone lines received an elevated number of calls.

In focusing almost exclusively on the contractor logs, the draft report overlooks the call logs maintained by the Voting Section itself in 2000. These provided extensive documentation about callers and a description of the callers' complaints, and have proved reliable and accurate. Moreover, the vast majority of calls received were tracked through these logs. Therefore, the Division respectfully notes that during the 2000 election it did have an effective means of tracking election-related phone calls.

Attachment V

In our April 2004 response, we provided you substantial detail regarding this additional means for tracking public election-related inquiries. Specifically, the Division's 800 number system was modified to permit as many callers as possible to express their views. It was temporarily reconfigured to provide four caller options to: (1) allow persons to express general opinions about the election (which represented the overwhelming majority of the calls); (2) provide specific information about voting-related incidents outside Florida; (3) provide specific information about voting-related incidents inside Florida; or (4) provide specific information about non-2000 election-related matters.

This modified system took effect late in the day on Thursday, November 9, 2000, and was discontinued following resolution of the Presidential election. The calls coming into the temporary 800 system were reviewed regularly by Voting Section personnel beginning on November 13, 2000. Return calls were made when there was some indication that the caller had substantive information about a specific voting rights violation.¹ Separate log forms tracked each of the 800 number options. Calls expressing general views without conveying specific information about voting rights violations were recorded on forms similar to the contractor logs, with category columns listed for each state (although these forms were changed periodically to reflect the changing Florida election situation). Calls made under the other options were recorded on log forms providing for much more specific information, including name, phone number, and a detailed description of the complaint. We recently provided GAO with these logs. In addition, we invited GOA staff to meet with Voting Section staff involved in dealing with the public during the 2000 election. Regrettably, GAO declined this invitation.

6. Nature of the Calls Received After the 2000 Election

In addition to focusing on only a subsection of the calls received, the draft report also fails to properly note the substance of the vast majority of phone calls received by the Department following the November 2000 election.

First, the draft report fails to note the fact that of the thousands of calls received by the Department's switchboard during this period, upwards of 95 percent did not provide specific complaints of possible violations of federal voting rights laws, but rather simply reflected citizen frustration or anger over the ongoing election dispute. This assessment was made by the Voting Section's experienced, career professional staff, including both trial attorneys and management. Moreover, determinations were made by staff only after receiving initial reports from the Department's switchboard operators, engaging in hundreds of conversations with citizens calling into the Voting Section's phone lines, and reviewing the contractor logs that were faxed to the Voting Section on an hourly basis.

¹ In our suggested changes to the section entitled "November 2000 Election Telephone Logs" of your draft Statement of Facts, which we sent to you on August 4, 2004, we explained the specifics of this additional call tracking system. Unfortunately, these changes were not incorporated in GAO's draft report.

Attachment V

Second, the draft report fails to note that the vast majority of the calls received by the contractor lines came from New York and California; the number of calls from Florida was relatively small. The vast majority of these expressed frustration over the situation in Florida, and were based on second-hand information and media stories.

The same was also true for the majority of calls originating from Florida. Voting Section personnel followed up with callers from Florida to determine whether they had substantive information about the Florida election. Again, however, the vast majority of these callers were calling to express frustration at the ongoing election dispute and had no specific information about federal law violations. In addition to following up with these callers, Voting Section personnel also pursued other avenues of complaints (e.g., calls made by voters directly to the Voting Section, complaint logs generated by the NAACP Voter Fund, hearings conducted by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and the NAACP, incidents receiving a large amount of publicity, etc.) to determine if federal laws had been violated.

As noted at the outset, it is imperative that the draft report accurately reflect these facts. At the same time, the Division fully concurs in the GAO's recommendation that an expanded recording system be implemented. For the 2004 election, the Division will continue to refine its tools for recording election-related calls to allow the public access to the Voting Section's complaint process.

7. Criminal Investigations

As you are aware, the GAO audit also examined the work done by the Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section, which is responsible, along with United States Attorneys' Offices, for investigating and prosecuting federal election crimes. The Chief of the Public Integrity Section, Noel Hillman, has asked us to include his comments to the portion of the draft report that pertains to the work of the Criminal Division. The first paragraph on page 22 of the draft report provides incorrect information about the training received by Assistant U.S. Attorneys. There are annual public corruption training conferences held by the Justice Department for Assistant United States Attorneys (AUSAs), and these include presentations on federal election crimes. These conferences are available to all AUSAs, including the AUSAs who are the designated district election officers. Some, but not all, of the 93 AUSAs who are their district's designated election officers may attend these conferences. In addition to these public corruption conferences, the district election officers are now attending the annual Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Conference, the first of which was held in 2002, to receive training on both civil rights issues important to ballot access as well as voting integrity issues important to election crime matters. Please note that the name of this annual conference is the "Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Conference," not the "Voting Integrity Conference."

In conclusion, we appreciate the opportunity to work with your staff concerning the important work of the Voting Section in enforcing federal voting rights. We are hopeful that the mistatements and inaccurate characterizations in this draft report will be corrected prior to its release.

Sincerely,

Bradley J. Schlozman
Deputy Assistant Attorney General

Jon M. Greenbaum

Jon M. Greenbaum is the Director of the Voting Rights Project for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law where he is responsible for directing the Committee's voting rights litigation which challenges all forms of voting rights discrimination practiced against minority and ethnic groups in the United States. This work includes challenges to electoral practices that violate the Voting Rights Act, including those which have the result of denying minorities an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and elect candidates of their choice and voting changes in jurisdictions covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act which worsen the position of minority voters, and challenges to electoral practices that violate the Fourteenth Amendment, including those which improperly infringe on the fundamental right to vote, practices that intentionally discriminate against minority voters, and claims brought pursuant to Bush v. Gore. The Voting Rights Project acts as co-counsel with participating law firms to bring such actions.

Mr. Greenbaum is also responsible for directing the Voting Rights Project's non-litigative activities, which include participating in efforts to maintain and expand the voting rights of minority citizens through legislation, participating in outreach efforts to minority citizens involving voting rights, producing position papers and articles on current issues of concern, coordinating with other organizations on issues affecting voting, and speaking at conferences and to the media regarding voting rights issues.

Immediately prior to joining the Lawyers' Committee, Mr. Greenbaum was a trial attorney in the Voting Section of the United States Department of Justice for seven years where he enforced voting rights laws for the United States, including Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, preclearance provisions under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, and the bilingual requirements under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act. In United States v. Charleston County, South Carolina, a case which challenged the at-large method of electing the Charleston County Council on grounds that it diluted the voting strength of African-American citizens, Mr. Greenbaum drafted and argued a successful plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment on all three preconditions of Thornburg v. Gingles, which is extremely rare, and was a member of the legal team that successfully tried the remainder of the action before the district court.

Prior to working at the Department of Justice, Mr. Greenbaum was a litigation associate in the Los Angeles office of the international law firm, Dewey Ballantine. Mr. Greenbaum worked on numerous litigation matters in the areas of environmental law, employment law, and business litigation.

Mr. Greenbaum graduated in 1989 from the University of California at Berkeley with Bachelor of Arts degrees in Legal Studies (with honors) and History. He received his law degree from the University of California at Los Angeles in 1993.

Mr. Greenbaum is of racially mixed heritage, with a mother of Japanese descent and a father who is white.

THE FEDERAL EXAMINER AND OBSERVER
PROGRAM

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2005

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC.

The Subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 12:38 p.m., in Room 2141, Rayburn House Office Building, the Honorable Steve Chabot (Chair of the Subcommittee) presiding.

Mr. CHABOT. Every Chairman should have a gavel when it was missing. So now we have it, we can get started.

This is the Subcommittee on the Constitution. I'm Steve Chabot, the Chairman.

I want to thank you all for attending this afternoon. This is the Subcommittee, as I said, on the Constitution, and the ninth in a series of hearings this Committee has held in the last several weeks examining the impact and effectiveness of the Voting Rights Act.

I'd like to thank all my colleagues again for their assistance in making each of these hearings informative and thought provoking, as we continue our efforts to look closely at those provisions of the Voting Rights Act which are set to expire in 2007.

Today, we will focus our attention on sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Voting Rights Act, each of which is set, as I said, to expire in 2 years, in 2007, unless Congress acts otherwise and reauthorizes.

Section 6 authorizes the Attorney General to send Federal examiners to cover jurisdictions to register new voters.

Section 7 outlines the procedures to be followed by these examiners when registering new voters.

And section 8 authorizes the Attorney General to send Federal observers into these covered jurisdictions to ensure that the rights afforded by Federal law are protected.

We have another distinguished panel of witnesses with us here this afternoon, and we want to thank them all for being here, and we look very much forward to their testimony.

The assistance provided by Federal examiners and observers in the election process has played an instrumental role in increasing minority voter participation.

After almost a century of racial discrimination in voting and several unsuccessful attempts to curtail these pervasive practices, Congress enacted the Voting Rights Act back in 1965.

Among the many different tools provided by Congress is the intervention of Federal examiners and observers. This Federal oversight was deemed necessary as result of the failure on the part of covered jurisdictions to openly accept minority voters in the political process.

In the initial years after enactment of the Voting Rights Act, Federal examiners and observers were used in record numbers. The impact these provisions have had on minority voters is reflected in the increasing number of minority voters registering to vote.

Over 112,000 minority voters have been registered by Federal examiners over the life of the Voting Rights Act.

And while the number of examiners sent to jurisdictions has decreased in recent years, the importance of Federal oversight in protecting minority voters has not diminished.

In the last 25 years, Federal observers have been sent to over 98 covered counties to ensure that minority voters are protected.

In fact, the Department of Justice just last week sent Federal observers to 16 jurisdictions in 7 States to monitor elections, to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act and other Federal voting and election statutes.

Today, we will examine the impact that Federal examiners and observers have had on increasing minority participation in the political process and the continued need for these provisions in the future.

Again, we look forward to hearing from all our witnesses here this afternoon.

And at this time, I will recognize the distinguished Ranking Member of the full Committee, Mr. Conyers of Michigan, if he would like to make an opening statement.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Before I begin, could I ask the Chair a question about the absence or withdrawal of the Department of Justice witness that was scheduled to have been here?

Mr. CHABOT. Yes. If the gentleman will yield?

Mr. CONYERS. And I'll yield.

Mr. CHABOT. We've been informed, and, in fact, I would note that the Department of Justice was scheduled to be our fourth witness today, but due to a scheduling conflict, they couldn't be here. They have submitted written testimony, and it's been made available to us, and they've offered to make themselves available at a later date, and to respond to any written questions that this Committee might have.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you very much for making that clear because their presence is very critical in how many of us will proceed under these—this very important consideration.

Mr. CHABOT. Would the gentleman yield one more time, please?

Mr. CONYERS. Of course.

Mr. CHABOT. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I might note that Mr. Weinberg is a former attorney with the Justice Department, and may be able to answer some of the questions that would be answered if the Justice Department were here.

But again, they—we will be able to provide those questions to them in writing and maybe an appearance down the road as well.

Thank you.

Mr. CONYERS. Oh, you're more than welcome.

This is a very important part of extending the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and I'm very interested from hearing—in hearing from the witnesses about the relationships between the examiners and the observers.

We're—it seems to me, frankly, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, that we may need to resort to a little rewriting of this section to clear up some parts of it.

The one thing I would love to hear commented on and maybe we'll do it in the questions is that we have a sent Members in for—we have sent either observers—people have been certified to come in to monitor elections, but it's usually about language barriers. It's not about racial exclusion or harassment or coercion or discouraging the vote.

For example, in the city—my city of Hamtramck, Michigan, in which there were some problems with Arab-Americans being harassed at the polls, and they—we sent in Federal observers, but in many parts of the country, where we really need somebody looking at some very fundamental questions, which leave it unnecessary for me to even discuss why we have to justify this extending and improving on these provisions 3 and 6 and 8. Every election cycle in our offices, we field numerous complaints involving election day mischief and worse from around the country—plenty of it.

As a matter of fact, we should write a report about it or Mr. Weinberg or Ms. Pew should write a book about it. Baltimore, 2002—intentions to confuse and suppress the voter turnout, where flyers misstated the date of the election and implied that overdue parking tickets, moving violations, behind in your rent were qualifications that could preclude you being allowed to vote.

Kentucky gubernatorial election, 2003—59 precincts with significant African-American populations targeted for vote challenges by local campaign officials.

May I have an additional minute, sir?

Mr. CHABOT. Without objection, so ordered.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you.

In North Carolina, in 1990, the Department sued over postcards mailed to African-American voters designed to discourage them from coming to polls by providing misinformation about the voter requirements.

They finally—there was a consent decree.

Now, the failure—one of the problems that were corrected from 1957 to 1965 is that we were giving retrospective relief for interference with the right to vote.

What we needed was prospective relief, and that's what's up for renewal now, and I hope we can gather a hardcore congressional group of Members that realize that that's the heart of this—one of the hearts of the hearing that we're holding here today.

We've had an election day last week. The Department sent Federal observers and personnel into 16 jurisdictions in 7 States.

In 2004, the Department coordinated and sent 1,463 Federal observers and 533 Department personnel to monitor 163 elections in 105 jurisdictions and 29 States.

So we're here about something that is really fundamental to improving the voter process in America.

I cannot get it out of my head that we have had two presidential elections in a row where one State in each election determined the outcome of the election, and each time more election violations and accusations of violations occurred in they State that provided the winner of the election with the presidency.

And so I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include it in the record.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired, and so ordered.

I would just note—the Chairman would just take a very brief not necessarily rebuttal, but I would just note that in the most recent election, the State that the gentleman was referring to happens to be my State, the State of Ohio, and there were many accusations of problems at polling places and things, and study after study that's been done really indicated that it was a fair election and that the vote was accurate; and I believe it was 118,000 was the margin in Ohio. So it wasn't like Florida, where there were 500 or something that made the difference.

So, for the record, Mr. Conyers.

Mr. CONYERS. Well, for the record—

Mr. CHABOT. Yeah.

Mr. CONYERS. —there is a book out called "What Went Wrong in Ohio," based on a report by the minority staff of the Judiciary Committee that has not been rebutted to my knowledge.

Mr. CHABOT. Yeah. I would just note that I believe that's the minority's opinion on that particular book and isn't—so I'd. But we could get on and on about that. But I—the one thing we do agree on is that the Voting Rights Act is very important and has been significant in protecting the rights to vote for many people in this country, and we're looking seriously at reauthorizing this, and so I think we agree on most of what the gentleman said in his opening statement.

And so I thank the gentleman for that.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Scott, is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, sections 6 through 8 of the Voting Rights Act contain the Federal Examiner and Observer provisions of the act, which allow Federal employees to observe polling place and voter counting activities and serve to document and deter inappropriate conduct.

Although these provisions are permanent, the primary way these provisions are utilized is through the section five preclearance coverage formula, which is set to expire in August 2007.

Federal observers have been deployed in every year, just about every year. From 1966 through December 8, 2003, almost 25,000 observers have been deployed in approximately a thousand elections.

While observer coverage in the early years was almost exclusively designed to protect the rights of Black voters in the Deep South, in recent years it has been approximately a 50-50 split between traditional election coverage and election coverage designed to protect the rights of minority language voters in various areas of the country.

In addition, the Department has routinely deployed its own civil rights personnel to serve as civil rights monitors in jurisdictions not covered by the Voting Rights Act.

During the 2004 election, the Department of Justice sent approximately 840 Federal observers and more than 250 Civil Rights Division personnel to 86 jurisdictions in 25 States to monitor general election activities to ensure voters were free from harassment, intimidation, and other illegal activity.

Over the last 40 years, the nature of the Federal examiner has changed. The examiner now usually plays a more administrative role; whereas, the observer's role has become more central to protecting voting rights.

Observers monitor elections in any certified jurisdiction for the purpose of observing whether eligible voters are allowed to vote, and whether votes cast by eligible voters are properly being counted.

Observers essentially serve as witnesses for what occurs in the polling place and during the counting of the vote.

In the case U.S. v. Berks County, that case shows the value of observers in documenting problems within the polls. The United States won the case, based upon the court-appointed observers' substantial evidence of hostile and unequal treatment of Hispanic and Spanish-speaking voters by polling officials.

The Berks case also illustrates why observers have a deterrent effect, because poll workers, election officials, and others involved in the election process know that their actions are being observed and recorded, some individuals are going to be discouraged from engaging in inappropriate behavior.

Sections 6 and 8 and other expiring provisions are essential to ensuring the fairness of our political process and equal opportunity for minorities in American politics.

It's imperative that we work together to strengthen these provisions, and I look forward to the testimony of our witnesses.

I yield back.

Mr. CHABOT. I thank the gentleman for yielding back.

The gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Watt, is recognized for the purpose of making an opening statement.

Mr. WATT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank the Chairman again and the Chairman of the full Committee for this series of hearings.

I think this is the ninth one we've had on the reauthorization.

Mr. CHABOT. That's correct.

Mr. WATT. And I think we're getting close to building the record that we need related to the expiring provisions and the necessity for their extension.

Today's hearing turns to the last set of provisions scheduled to expire in 2007. Although much of the media coverage and public interest in the Voting Rights Act has been focused largely on section 5 and section 203, the Federal Examiner and Observer Program has historically played an integral role in ensuring that voting rights are actually shielded from Election Day abuses and the violation of those rights are properly documented.

While there is some question about the necessity of the Federal examiner provisions going forward, the role and continued need of well-trained Federal observers assigned to monitor elections in certified jurisdictions is absolutely critical.

The value to the average citizen of a Federal presence at the polls in those jurisdictions with a pattern of voting irregularities and infractions is simply incalculable.

Voters feel more at ease and confident when the Government places a high priority on election monitoring.

Conversely, those who might otherwise commit fraud or harass or intimidate eligible voters are deterred from doing so.

Despite significant gains in preventing blatant acts of discrimination at the polls, intentional efforts to undermine racial and language minority voters persist.

Last week the Voting Rights Initiative of the University of Michigan Law School issued its final report entitled "Documenting Discrimination in Voting: Judicial Findings Under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act Since 1982." And I'm going to ask unanimous consent that we enter this report in the record, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. Without objection, so ordered.

Mr. WATT. Combing through the over 700 court cases, the researchers document repeated and sometimes egregious evidence of intentional discrimination against Native Americans, elderly African-Americans, and others on election day.

Just last year, at the request of Ranking Member Conyers, Congressman Waxman and Senator Lieberman, the GAO reviewed the Department of Justice's activities to address—acknowledged election-related voting irregularities, including conduct prohibited by the Voting Rights Act in Florida and other jurisdictions during Election 2000, and I would ask unanimous consent that that report be entered into the record also.

Mr. CHABOT. Without objection, also so ordered.

Mr. WATT. Although a DOJ witness could not be here today, or at least not a current employee of the DOJ, I would encourage the continued deployment of DOJ attorneys and other professionals on a judicious and non-political basis to supplement, but not to replace the work of statutorily authorized observers.

Federal observers have statutory rights to access not shared by Department of Justice attorneys.

It is important that this access to the polling place be preserved to guarantee every voter's ability to cast their vote and to have their votes counted free of unlawful discrimination.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, one final thing I want to deal with—that's—really we haven't had a hearing on yet, but there's been some testimony about over the course of our hearings, and that's we need to make sure that the award of expert fees to prevailing parties in litigation is put into the reauthorization.

The fees of experts in these cases are just—have become a real burden for everybody. I understand that prior to the 1982 reauthorization, there was an agreement to put this provision in, and because of the crunch at the last minute, the provision actually just never got put into the law.

And I don't think there's really any controversy about it. Prior testimony has already established the incredible expense imposed on bona fide victims of voting rights violations to assemble the necessary evidence to sustain their burden of proof in a private action.

By allowing expert fees to prevail in parties, we would bring the Voting Rights Act into conformity with other Civil Rights legislation and promote the continued partnership between individual and Government enforcement that has made the act the success it is today.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and yield back and look forward to the witnesses; welcome them and thank them for being here.

Mr. CHABOT. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman's time has expired.

The Chair would also note the presence of a distinguished Member of the House, Congressman David Scott of Georgia, whose attendance has been exemplary at these hearings. Not actually a Member of this Committee, but I'd ask unanimous consent that he be recognized and have all the rights of a Committee Member today and be allowed to make an opening statement should he chose to do so, and also be allowed to question witnesses.

The gentleman is recognized, if he'd like to make an opening statement.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would just like to associate my remarks with my distinguished Democratic colleagues who've spoken eloquently on the statements so far in the interest of time.

But there is—and my Republican colleague, the Chairman, quite naturally. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I also recognize you first.

If it were not for your graciousness, I wouldn't be here with this excellent opportunity.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. I was listening. Thank you.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. Well, I may add, I had already gone over and shaken [sic.] his hand and thanked him personally.

Mr. WATT. I just didn't want him to engage in that oversight, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. When all this goodwill is over. Yeah.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. And only one point that I certainly want to—a point that I think we would—I'm interested in is the why Federal observers are—you think they are—Mr. Weinberg, especially I was reading over your testimony earlier today—and your point about why Federal observers are necessary, but Federal examiners are not, certainly begs for some good discussion. So I look forward to that.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. The gentleman's time has expired.

I'd like to—before I introduce the panel—note that without objection all Members will have 5 legislative days to submit additional materials for the hearing record.

And I'd now like to introduce our very distinguished panel of witnesses here this afternoon. Our first witness will be Ms. Nancy Randa, Deputy Associate Director for Talent Services, Human Resources, Products, and Services Division, at the U.S. Department of Personnel Management.

As Deputy Associate Director, Ms. Randa oversees the services and support provided to Federal agencies in staffing and human resources, organizational and individual assessment, training and management assistance, and technology services.

Included in her responsibilities is overseeing OPM's Voting Rights Program, which deploys observers to designated polling sites to monitor elections.

Prior to serving as Deputy Associate Director, Ms. Randa served as Acting Associate Director for Merit Systems Oversight and Effectiveness, where she spearheaded a variety of projects that support human capital management and accountability.

Ms. Randa is an active supporter of human resources workforce transformation efforts, working on HR curriculum efforts at the graduate school operated out of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and with the Human Resources Management Council.

We welcome you here this afternoon, Ms. Randa.

Our second witness will be Ms. Penny Pew.

Ms. Pew has served as Apache County Elections Director since 2001. She has been a certified Elections Officer with the Arizona Secretary of State's Office since 2001, as well as Arizona's League of Cities and Towns.

In 2003, Ms. Pew successfully completed the Southwest Leadership Program for Local and State Government from the University of Arizona Institute for Public Policy and Management.

In 2004, Ms. Pew partnered with the Navajo Nation Office of the Speaker on the successful Get Out the Vote 2004 Campaign. She most recently served as a panelist for the National Commission on the Voting Rights Act. We welcome you here this afternoon, Ms. Pew.

And our third and final witness will be Mr. Barry Weinberg.

Mr. Weinberg is a former Deputy Chief and Acting Chief of the Voting Section at the U.S. Department of Justice.

From 1965 until 2000, Mr. Weinberg served in many key roles at the Department, including supervising investigations and litigation under the Voting Rights Act.

In December 1999, the Barry H. Weinberg Award was established by the Department of Justice, recognizing an individual who has made an outstanding contribution to the effectiveness of the Federal Observer Program for monitoring polling place procedures under the Voting Rights Act.

Mr. Weinberg is the author of numerous articles on the Voting Rights Act, including a 2002 law review article, co-authored with Lynne Utrecht, titled "Problems in America's Polling Places: How They Can be Stopped."

Welcome, Mr. Weinberg, as well, as all the panelists. And I would—as I had noted before, the—for the record, the Department of Justice was scheduled to be our fourth witness here today, but due to a scheduling conflict, they were unable to be here.

The Department of Justice has submitted written testimony, which has been made available to us, and has offered to make themselves available at a later date and to respond to any written questions that this Committee might have, and those could be submitted to the Department of Justice.

A couple of other items I just need to mention is some of you have testified before; some of you may not be aware of this. We have what's called a 5 minute rule. There are two sets of lights there. They'll go for 5 minutes. For 4 minutes, they'll be green. When there's 1 minute left, it'll turn yellow, and red light will come on when your 5 minutes is up.

I won't gavel you down immediately at that time, but we'd ask within reason to try to stay within that 5 minutes as much as possible.

It's also the practice of the Committee to swear in all witnesses appearing before it, so if you wouldn't mind, if you could each stand and raise your right hand.

[Witnesses sworn.]

Mr. CHABOT. Each witness has indicated in the affirmative. Thank you.

And we'll now hear from our first witness. Ms. Randa, you're recognized for 5 minutes.

TESTIMONY OF NANCY RANDA, DEPUTY ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR FOR HUMAN RESOURCES PRODUCTS AND SERVICES, U.S. OFFICE OF PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

Ms. RANDA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee. I am pleased to be here this afternoon to discuss the Office of Personnel Management's role in carrying out sections of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

OPM works closely with the Department of Justice, specifically the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division to assign voting rights observers to locations designated by the Department.

OPM's ultimate success with this program depends on its ability to recruit, train, deploy, and supervise observers of Election Day procedures.

Under the Voting Rights Act, at the request of a U.S. District Court or the U.S. Attorney General, OPM provides for appointment of 1: examiners, to examine and register qualified individuals denied the right to register in covered jurisdictions; 2: hearing officers, to entertain challenges to the actions of examiners; 3: support staff; and 4: observers to monitor actual polling places on Election Day and the subsequent tabulation of the votes.

Since 1966, we have deployed over 26,000 observers in a total of 22 States. Prior to 1976, we sent observers to only five States—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina.

However, in the past 10 years, as more jurisdictions have been subject to coverage under the Minority Language provisions of the act, we sent the next largest number of observers after Mississippi to these States: Arizona, New Mexico, New Jersey, California, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New York.

Voting Rights observers serve as neutral monitors, witnesses, who do not intervene if there are violations. They only watch, listen, and record events that occur at particular polling sites on election days.

At present, we have a pool of approximately 900 intermittent employees, called into service on an as needed basis, who come from all walks of life, including Federal employees and retirees, students, and other public and private sector workers.

We schedule 1-day classroom sessions for observers to provide in-depth training on the overall process, on specific observer responsibilities, and on administrative issues.

We also provide refresher training during pre-briefing sessions on the day before the election. Whenever possible, we do role playing in the training to demonstrate to the observers the proper way of handling themselves at the polling sites.

In brief, the deployment process works this way: Prior to an election, the Department of Justice notifies OPM as to when and where it will need observers.

OPM then assigns a Voting Rights Coordinator to work with Justice's lead attorney to allocate observers to polling sites, coordinate logistics, and assign a captain to oversee the execution of the deployment.

The day before an election, a Department attorney briefs the observers, specifying issues of concern and activities to be reported. Throughout the day, observers report such information to the captain, who passes this information to a Department attorney. Only the Department of Justice determines if intervention is necessary, and only the Department of Justice takes action.

Toward the end of election day, the attorney determines when to call back the observers. The observers then return to their staging site and prepare a written report, one for each polling site, to document what they saw and heard throughout the day.

This is the bulk of what OPM does. But the statute also calls on OPM to have an examiner for each jurisdiction where observers will be assigned.

Originally, these examiners prepared a Federally-maintained list of voters who were denied the right to register in covered jurisdictions and they received calls from citizens regarding election day issues or incidents.

This function, however, has changed over the years. No voters have been added to the Federally-maintained list since 1983, as registration barriers have largely been eliminated.

Moreover, since there have been no challenges to registration decisions in the past 30 years, there has been no need for hearing officers.

Also due to advances in technology, toll-free numbers now allow citizens to report incidents and information to these examiners remotely in real time and 24 hours a day during the election period.

Under the act, OPM is required to publish voter registration qualifications of each covered State in the Federal Register, as well as to publish the list of examiners, places for voter registration, and examiner assignments.

However, these publications requirements may no longer be necessary since they are now covered nationwide by provisions of the Help America Vote Act and the National Voter Registration Act, which set out Federal standards for voter registration.

That concludes my testimony, and I would be pleased to respond to any questions the Subcommittee may have.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Randa follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF NANCY RANDA

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee:

I am pleased to be here this afternoon to discuss the Office of Personnel Management's (OPM) role in carrying out sections 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 12 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (the Act).

Currently, implementation of the Voting Rights Act at OPM is managed by the Division for Human Resources Products and Services in the Center for Talent Services. This office works closely with the Department of Justice (the Department), specifically the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division, to assign Voting Rights observers to locations designated by the Department. OPM's ultimate success with this program depends on its ability to recruit, train, deploy, and supervise observers of election-day procedures.

With regard to responsibilities assigned to OPM (prior to 1979, the U.S. Civil Service Commission), the Voting Rights Act provides, at the request of a U.S. District Court or the Attorney General of the United States, for the appointment of examiners to interview, ascertain qualifications, and register, if appropriate, qualified individuals denied the right to register by State and local officials in covered jurisdictions; hearing officers to entertain appeals and challenges to the actions of examiners; support staff as necessary to allow these individuals to perform their responsibilities; and observers to monitor actual polling places on election day and the subsequent tabulation of the votes. These provisions have not materially changed since initial passage of the Act in 1965. The Voting Rights Act also requires OPM to promulgate regulations on procedures for challenging the actions of examiners and to publish in the Federal Register individual State registration qualifications.

Since 1966, we have deployed over 26,000 observers in a total of 22 States. Prior to 1976, we sent observers to only 5 States: Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina. In the past 10 years, as more jurisdictions have been subject to coverage under the minority language provisions of the Act, we sent the next largest number of observers, after Mississippi, to these States (in this order): Arizona, New Mexico, New Jersey, California, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New York.

Voting Rights observers serve as neutral monitors, who do not intervene if there are violations. They only watch, listen, and record events that occur at particular polling sites on election days. At present, we have a pool of approximately 900 intermittent employees—called into service on an as-needed basis—who come from all walks of life, including Federal retirees, students, other public- and private-sector workers, and some full-time employees of various Federal agencies.

We schedule one-day classroom sessions for observers to provide in-depth training on the overall process, specific observer responsibilities, and administrative issues. We also provide refresher training during pre-briefing sessions on the day before the election. Whenever possible, we do role-playing in the training to demonstrate to the observers the proper way of handling themselves at the polling sites.

In brief, the deployment process works this way: Prior to an election, the Department notifies OPM as to when and where it will need observers. OPM then assigns a Voting Rights Coordinator to (1) work with Justice's lead attorney to allocate observers to polling sites; (2) coordinate logistics, such as arranging hotel meeting space and sleeping rooms for observers, leasing mobile phones, and making rental car and airline reservations to transport observers; and (3) assign a captain to oversee the execution of the deployment.

The day before an election, a Department attorney briefs the observers, specifying issues of concern and activities to report. For example, if a jurisdiction has been suspected of hampering non-English speakers' right to have interpreters or of not providing ballots in other languages as directed by consent decrees or court orders, the Department's attorney may ask that observers witness the provided assistance and/or make note of how many voters received language assistance. Observers may also be asked to note how many non-English speakers were turned away from polling sites or were given provisional ballots. Throughout the day, observers report such information to the captain, who passes this information to a Department attorney. Only the Department determines if intervention is necessary, and only the Department takes action. Toward the end of an election day, the Department determines when to call observers back. The observers then return to their staging site and prepare written reports—one for each polling site—to document what they saw and heard throughout the day.

That is the bulk of what OPM does. The statute also calls on OPM to have an examiner for each jurisdiction where observers will be assigned. Originally, examiners prepared a Federally maintained list of voters who were denied the right to register by State and local officials in covered jurisdictions, and they received calls from citizens regarding election-day issues or incidents. This function, however, has changed over the years. No voters have been added to the Federally maintained list since 1983 as registration barriers have been eliminated. Moreover, since there have been no challenges to registration decisions in the past 30 years, there has been no need for hearing officers. Also, due to advances in technology, toll-free numbers allow citizens to report incidents and information to examiners remotely, in real time, and 24 hours a day during the election period.

Under the Act, OPM is required to publish voter registration qualifications of each covered State in the Federal Register. It has also been required to publish the list of examiners, places for voter registration, and examiner assignments. However, these publication requirements may no longer be necessary, since they are now covered nationwide by provisions of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) and "Motor-Voter" statute (National Voter Registration Act), which set out Federal standards for voter registration.

OPM's Voting Rights Program costs have ranged from under $1 million in earlier years to a high of $4 million in the Fiscal Year that included the 2004 general election. Putting aside the expected increase in 2004, the overall trend has been for an increase in program coverage and cost, particularly for minority-language coverage.

That concludes my testimony, and I would be pleased to respond to any questions the subcommittee may have.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much. Ms. Pew, you're recognized for 5 minutes.

TESTIMONY OF PENNY L. PEW, ELECTIONS DIRECTOR, APACHE COUNTY, ARIZONA

Ms. PEW. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee, for the opportunity to testify today for the reauthorization of section 6 and section 8, as they relate to section 203 of the Voting Rights Act.

As stated before, my name is Penny Pew, and I've been the Elections Director in Apache County since 2001.

And one of our primary focuses has been providing the minority and prospective voters the necessary election materials to ensure that each vote cast is an informed vote.

While this education began in the 1990's as a mandate, we continue to provide these services to our electors so that the rewarding changes that we have experienced will continue.

I would like to speak to the Federal Observer Program, which I believe was implemented following guidelines from the consent decree.

The Observer Program has successfully functioned as a check and balance feature in the translator program. One of the three-member teams sent to the 33 precincts on the Navajo Nation speaks Navajo, who I view as a partner.

During the day, these observers are able to witness poll workers and translators assisting the voters as they impart ballot information. The observers ask voters if they may observe the process. They do not interfere with the process and have never, to my knowledge, given any instruction to improve or to correct a process.

The observers note different scenarios occurring during the course of the day to ensure that fraudulent information is not given to voters. In some instances, the observers report happenings to their DOJ central contact, who I meet with on each Federal Election Day.

We are able to discuss the information relating to the day's events at the polling places. This is absolutely the best way for me to know instantaneously of situations that can be rectified in a very timely manner.

I explain to those poll workers that the individuals have been invited to help us do our duties. Observers are greeted by the inspector of the polling place in an attempt to put all parties at ease and to assure the poll workers that the observers should not be viewed as hostile.

Identification is presented and worn by each observer throughout the day. Due to the rural area of Apache County and in an attempt to minimize their presence, observers are requested to dress casual to better fit their surroundings.

In follow-up post-election meetings, these notes are discussed, and, if necessary, changes are made in personnel or training procedures to ensure that no repeat incidents occur.

As you are aware, the Navajo language is unique and could be very easily misinterpreted. Translators who serve on these election boards attend exclusive training classes, which are taught by full-time outreach workers, using written copies, flip charts, cassette recordings.

During these classes, members are asked to read aloud the information together as a whole group. Open questions and clarifications are given by the outreach workers to ensure that each translator is uniform in their ballot translation, voter to voter, precinct to precinct.

In 2004, Apache County extended partnership to include the Navajo Nation Office of the Speaker. We provided various educational materials through chapter meetings, community forums, fair booths, and frankly anywhere there were voters.

I am pleased to report that this was a worthwhile project. As it turned out, Navajo Nation increased to 17,955 voters, comparatively to 14,277 voters in 2000. Additionally, the numbers increased in a precinct on the White Mountain Apache land from 44 voters in 2000 to 62 in 2004.

Now, as an Election Director, I've spent untold hours developing a program that is indigenous to Apache County. I've spent time in the polls and in the communities listening to these voters, learning what we as election directors can do to ensure that the most fundamental right as citizens of this great nation enjoy the right to an informed vote, with the knowledge that it will be counted without worry of fraudulent actions in or out of the polling place.

In closing, I fervently believe that is incumbent upon this Committee to use the expertise of each witness to further the Voting Rights Act, sections 6 and 8, Federal Examiner and Observer provision; and continuing programs such as the one used in Apache County.

The observer program has proven successful for us, and has given us insight to the happenings at each polling place that would otherwise go unnoticed.

For these and other additional reasons, which are stated in my written testimony, the reauthorization of these sections is critical to maintaining the robust program in Apache County.

And, again, thank you for your—for this opportunity.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Pew follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF PENNY L. PEW

Thank you Mr. Chairman and committee members for the opportunity to testify before you today regarding the reauthorization of Section 6 and Section 8 as they relate to Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973c.

My name is Penny L. Pew, and I am the elections director of Apache County in northeastern Arizona. I have had the pleasure of this position since June of 2001.

My primary focus has been on providing the minority and prospective voters, the necessary election materials to ensure that each vote cast is an informed vote. While this education began in 1982 as a mandate, we continue to provide services to our electors so that the rewarding changes that we have experienced will continue.

FEDERAL OBSERVER PROGRAM

Following a lawsuit charging Apache County with discrimination against Native Americans, as it related to election procedures and materials, a 1989 Consent Decree was entered establishing the Navajo Language Election Information Program. A portion of this program was the observer program which has successfully functioned as a check and balance feature to this program.

According to the 2000 census, the total population of Apache County is 69,423 persons, of whom 53,375 are Native American (76.9%). The voting age population of 42,692 persons, of whom 31,470 are Native American (73.7%); and that of all Native Americans of voting age, over one-third are limited-English proficient (11,377 persons).

Most of the 3 member teams sent to the 33 precincts located on the Navajo Nation have at least one Navajo speaking member, who I view as a "partner". During the day, these observers are able to witness poll workers and translators assisting the voters as they impart ballot information. The observers ask voters if they may observe the process. They do not interfere with the process and have never to my knowledge given any instruction to correct or improve a process. The observers note different scenarios occurring during the course of the day to ensure that fraudulent information is not given to voters. In some instances, the observers report happenings to their DOJ central contact, who I meet with on Election Day. We are able to discuss the information relating to the days events at the polling places. This is absolutely the best way for me to know instantaneously of situations that can be rectified in a timely manner.

I explain to the poll workers that these individuals have been 'invited' to help us as we do our duties. Observers are greeted by the Inspector of the polling place in an attempt to put all parties at ease and assure the poll workers that the observers should not be viewed as hostile. Identification is presented and worn by each observer throughout the day. Due to the rural area of Apache County and in an attempt to minimize their presence, observers are requested to dress casual to better fit their surroundings.

In a follow-up post election meeting, these notes are discussed and if necessary, changes are made in personnel or training procedures to ensure no repeat incidents.

Translators who serve on the election boards attend extensive training classes which are taught by full-time outreach workers using Power Point presentations, flip charts, cassette recordings as well as written copies, of the ballot information. Each translator and Inspector (lead poll worker) are provided a cassette and also written ballot information. During the training classes, each member is asked to read aloud the information. This is accomplished in a relaxed atmosphere where the class participates as a whole. Open questions and clarification are given by the outreach workers to ensure that each translator is uniform in their ballot translation, voter to voter, precinct to precinct.

VOTER OUTREACH AND EDUCATION

Advertisements

Apache County has provided bulletin boards to each chapter house facility where upcoming election information is posted and kept current. Voters have learned to use this tool in gaining the necessary election information. Periodic checks are done to ensure that only current information is posted.

Radio stations and newspapers have been instrumental in distributing the necessary election information. This was originally outlined in the Consent Decree 1989 with many additional measures added for further enrichment.

Language Training

As each of you are aware, the Navajo language is unique and without extensive linguistic training, could be misinterpreted. A Navajo Language Election Glossary has been developed over the years with input from outreach workers in Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, and the Navajo Nation in an effort to make the election terminology used county to county and state to state as uniform as possible. As times and technology change, the glossary is updated through proper approval.

The outreach workers use this glossary to translate ballot issues in a Tri-County forum to further ensure uniformity. This is imperative, as many precincts lie on county lines where voters may see more than one county ballot, radio or newspaper ads or other informational materials.

Translators/Poll workers

Poll workers are given a detailed manual to use as a guide in fulfilling their obligations on Election Day, in a uniform manner. Additional items are distributed to ensure that the poll worker has all the tools necessary to assist the voter. In an effort to further educate, role playing was implemented and has proven to be a valuable tool in explaining ballot measures, as they are often very complicated.

Due to the extensive land area of over 11,000 square miles, training classes are held in various locations throughout the county to allow the poll workers and translators easier access to training. Each individual is compensated for their time to attend these classes.

After the training class, poll workers are encouraged to listen to their audio cassette and practice the issues. Many mentioned that they didn't have access to a player. So, in 2003, we established a cassette player library for workers to check out a player to listen and study the information. This was well received and the post election remarks indicated improvement; additionally, all cassette players were returned to the county library.

State and County Monitoring of Effectiveness

Meetings are scheduled on Tri-State and Tri-County levels to discuss any issues that may need to be remedied. Any/all issues are handled by each county official to keep uniformity in the informational disbursement process. Tri-county personnel work closely on translations and exchanges of information to better ensure uniformity in the disbursed information. NEA officials are invited and usually attend these meetings with valuable input on the issues.

NEA (Navajo Election Administration)

All information is approved by the NEA prior to distribution including but not limited to announcements (radio and print), ballot translations, audio tapes, and any other training information. All training schedules are provided to the NEA and an open invitation to attend any/all class.

The following is taken from a letter written to me by Kimmeth Yazzie, Navajo Nation Program Coordinator/Language contact:

"The purpose of the minority language Consent Decrees has generated a much greater cooperation and assistance to provide the necessary election and voter registration services to the Navajo Nation within the counties, much more than was anticipated from the beginning. Although the Consent Decree specific to Apache County expired in 1992, the county and the Navajo Nation continue to strive forward to this day to make voter registration and elections easier for the citizens in Apache County. Such services as situating outreach offices and Navajo speaking personnel in local areas with additional personnel when it becomes necessary, has made voting easier for the people of Apache County. An example, the development of the Navajo Glossary has opened doors to better communication with the Navajo Nation citizens as well as other tribes seeking development of the same methods of outreach. Developments of graphic materials and video and audio recordings provide our people with a better understanding of the elections. Bringing voter registration to the local area eliminates the long distance travels just to register to vote for outlying areas. Setting up and coordinating events together with the Navajo Nation and the county provides voters with two services at one location and a better understanding of the two distinctive elections. The clearance of all materials and information through the Navajo Election Administration provides assurance to the Navajo Nation that the proper and sufficient election information is provided to the people of the Navajo Nation, thus developing trust and alliance. Ideas to better provide services are always being exchanged between the county and the Navajo Nation. We learn from each other. Since the expiration of the Consent Decree in 1992, the relationship between the tribe and the county has grown and advanced beyond the bounds of the Consent Decree requirements.

In closing, I can honestly say that the language program has been positive for our county in educating and promoting our most fundamental right . . . the power of our vote."

Outreach/Satellite Offices

Apache County has two county district offices which are on Reservation Land; District I in Chinle houses a satellite office. District II in Ganado houses a second office. Voters and residents of surrounding areas visit to check voter registration and to receive any election updates.

Regular meetings are scheduled and appear on agendas for the chapter visits at which time presentations are given using flip charts, PowerPoint presentations, audio aids as well as other means to convey the necessary information. Presentations are given in the Navajo language.

All political views of the outreach workers are kept unbiased and neutral at all times. Implementation to 'piggy-back' with the jurisdictions has been effective in that the outreach worker gives factual ballot information and the jurisdictions are available to answer any additional questions that the public may have.

Deputy Registrars

Deputy Registrars have proven valuable in assisting the voters in the ongoing voter registration and education process. Each Deputy Registrar is trained in current procedures. Each chapter office, Navajo Election Office and other Navajo Nation officials are trained and have provided further election information. Each chapter maintains a current voter listing, voter registration forms and during election cycles, early voting request forms.

Collect Phone Calls

Apache County happily accepts collect calls to assist the caller in election-related information. In an effort to better serve the people, an '800' number is advertised on all out-going materials and advertisements as well as the website.

Voter Education

Numerous items with voter information in distributed to spark interest in what has been viewed as boring in the past. Colorful brochures and interactive community meetings have been the focus in gaining voter recognition. For instance, during the Presidential Preference Election, February, 2004, in an effort to better explain who may vote, an informational brochure was produced in English, receiving positive input. A mirror copy was then distributed in the Navajo language. This helped gain further notice among the voters, with the outreach workers receiving community comments for further ideas in education. We also provide "I Voted" stickers in the Navajo language and it has been spectacular.

VOTER TURNOUT

In 2004 Apache County extended partnership to include the Navajo Nation Office of the Speaker in an effort known as "Get the Vote Out". Due to the low voter turnout experienced in past elections, we provided various educational materials at chapter meetings, community forums, fair booths, and anywhere there were going to be voters. I am pleased to report that this was a worthwhile project as turnout in precincts on the Navajo Nation increased to 17,955 voters casting ballots in 2004, comparatively 14,277 voters participated in 2000. Additionally, on the White Mountain Apache Lands, Apache County has one precinct where 44 voters participated in 2000, rising in 2004 to 62. This is due in part to the education at school and community meetings.

Political Protocol

During the 2002 election cycle, a non-Native American entered several polling places without the proper clearance. While inside the polling place, he intimidated the poll workers and voters, creating chaos as he progressed to various polls. For this reason alone, we implemented a Political Protocol presentation and accompanying brochure. The brochure is included in each candidate packet and a personal invitation to attend a short meeting outlining the proper protocol when campaigning on Native Lands. This is sent to each candidate, county, state or federal. We had great success and I am pleased to report that during the five elections which were held in Apache County in 2004, we had no reported violations in or around the polling places.

Early Voting

Ballot request forms are given to the Chapter Officials, County District offices on the Navajo Nation, State offices and the NEA. Outreach workers keep forms with them at all times while traveling and presenting throughout the county. These forms can also be accessed using the website www.co.apache.az.us/recorder.

Early Voting drives are unique in Apache County. After specified advertisements in newspaper and on radio, a trailer which has been painted in a patriotic motif travels to scheduled locations throughout the rural areas. This trailer can be found many places such as on fence lines, shopping lots, trading posts, and post offices to name a few.

Election Day

Apache County employs trained bilingual poll workers at each of the polling places on Native Lands. These poll workers are recruited with the help of chapter officials, postings and word of mouth.

Where joint elections are held between the Navajo Nation and the County, where polling places are shared, all efforts are made to make certain that the poll workers are trained and that a good working relationship is established between the Navajo Nation and the County officials to provide an enjoyable election day. The NEA and the County exchange poll worker lists to ensure that no candidate or close relative appears on either ballot.

Each polling place is monitored for effectiveness by a 'Troubleshooter.' This person is a county employee who has received training in the election process and is able to identify and correct irregularities on-the-spot. This person is the liaison between the county elections director and the polling place.

CLOSING COMMENTS

As election director, I have spent untold hours developing a program that is indignant to Apache County. I have spent time in the polls and in the communities listening to the voters, learning what we as election directors can do to ensure that the most fundamental right as citizens of this great nation enjoy . . . the right to an informed vote with the knowledge that it will be counted without worry of fraudulent actions in or out of the polling place.

In closing, I fervently believe that it is incumbent upon this Committee to use the expertise of each witness to further The Voting Rights Act: Sections 6 and 8—Federal Examiner and Observer Provisions, in continuing programs such as the one used in Apache County, Arizona as it relates to the Native Americans. The observer program has proven successful for us and has given us insight to the happenings at each polling place that may otherwise go unnoticed. For these and other additional reasons, which are stated in my written testimony, the reauthorization of these sections is critical to maintaining the robust program in Apache County. Again, I thank you for this opportunity.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much, Ms. Pew.
Mr. Weinberg, you're recognized for 5 minutes.

TESTIMONY OF BARRY H. WEINBERG, FORMER DEPUTY CHIEF AND ACTING CHIEF, VOTING SECTION, CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION,
U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. WEINBERG. Thank you very much, and thank you for asking me to come here.

I may be one of the few witnesses that you have who is not connected with any office or organization, and probably one of the fewer witnesses that you're going to have that was there at the inception of the Voting Rights Act and saw the Federal examiners listing people to vote and saw the Federal observers when they first started.

But I know I'm the only one here among the witnesses who was a supervisor of the Federal Examiner and Observer Program in the Justice Department for 25 years, and it's from that vantage point that it seems to me that there are at least three questions that ought to be addressed now when we're thinking about the reauthorization of these provisions.

The first question is whether the provisions for Federal observers and Federal examiners are still needed. I think that the answer to that question is that the provisions for the Federal observers are crucial to the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, and need to be reauthorized, maybe even made permanent; but the provisions for the Federal examiners not so much.

The Federal examiners' functions—most of them are outdated. The procedures are cumbersome and archaic, and I don't think they serve any real purpose anymore. And so my conclusion would be that they're not needed anymore in the Voting Rights Act as it stands today.

The second question I think is whether there should remain a link between the certification of a county for Federal examiners and the later assignment of Federal observers to the county.

Under the Voting Rights Act, the certification of a county for Federal examiners is a prerequisite to the assignment of Federal observers.

But the functions that they perform, the link that they had, doesn't exist anymore. When Federal examiners first registered people to vote, those people had to go to polling places where there were hostile election officials. You had African-American voters facing hostile White polling place workers and voters for the first time in many, many rural areas across the South. The Federal observers were written into the act to watch what happened to those newly enfranchised voters and to allow the Justice Department to take action to assure their safety in the polling places. That situation just doesn't exist anymore, and I think the linkage is cumbersome and ought not to exist either.

The third question I think is whether the Federal observers ought to be continued as a law enforcement function under the Voting Rights Act, which is what they perform; or whether it's possible to make the reports and information from the Federal observers public after the election, as is done overseas.

I just got back last week from being an international observer in an election in Azerbaijan, and I've done that a few other times. The organizations that do that kind of work do it in order to publicize the information that they get from the polls immediately after the election.

But I think that would be a real mistake. I think that the use of Federal observers in law enforcement is important and ought to be continued and the publication of the information they get immediately would be detrimental.

All this revolves around what I consider the most important point, which is that the existence of Federal observers is crucial, and it's irreplaceable in the Voting Rights Act. After all, there's no other way for the law enforcement function of the Justice Department to be able to be performed with regard to harassment and intimidation and disenfranchisement of racial and language minority group members in the polling place on Election Day. And that's because State laws are written to keep other people, including Federal investigators out of the polls.

State laws, almost all of them—and they vary, but invariably they allow in the polls on Election Day the voters and the polling place officials, and they keep everybody else out. They allow police in if there's a disturbance, but mainly it's to have this safe harbor for voters on Election Day. But the effect of that, from a law enforcement point of view, is it keeps the law enforcement officers out. There is no way that the Justice Department lawyers could know about this harassment and this intimidation without the Federal observers, because the Voting Rights Act allows the Federal observers in. Federal observers are witnesses. They are the eyes and the ears of the Justice Department attorneys in the polling places.

Without them, the law, the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act would be much abused, and so I would—my conclusion is that the observer provision is necessary. It ought to be reauthorized. It ought to be continued, and I think there should be some consideration given to making it permanent, taking it out of the special provisions and making it adjunct to sections 2 and 203 of the Voting Rights Act.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF BARRY H. WEINBERG

Statement of

Barry H. Weinberg

Before the

Subcommittee on the Constitution
Committee on the Judiciary
United States House of Representatives

Concerning

The Voting Rights Act: Sections 6, 7 and 8— Federal Examiner and Observer Provisions

November 15, 2005

Chairman Chabot, Ranking Member Nadler, distinguished members of the Subcommittee:

Thank you for inviting me to talk this afternoon about the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

There are three central questions on the retention of the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act:

1. Are the federal examiner and federal observer provisions still needed?

The federal observer provision is still needed. Most of the federal examiner provisions are no longer are needed.

2. Should the initial assignment of federal observers to a jurisdiction remain dependent on the certification of the jurisdiction for federal examiners?

No, but a certification-like decision should be required when federal observers are initially assigned to a jurisdiction.

3. Should the federal observer provision remain solely as a law enforcement tool, or should the findings of the observers be made immediately available to the public?

The federal observer provision should remain as a law enforcement function. Publication of the observers' findings would be detrimental to that function.

The following is an overview of the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act, my experience with them, and the reasons why I have answered the questions as I have. This recitation is followed by a detailed explanation of the Voting Rights Act's provisions for federal examiners and observers—Sections 6, 7 and 8 of the Voting Rights Act—and fact situations and federal court cases that demonstrate why the federal observer provisions are still needed.

The federal examiner and federal observer provisions had a real impact on African Americans in the South.

I was a lawyer in the United States Justice Department's Civil Rights Division from 1966 until my retirement in January 2000. Beginning in 1973 I was partly, and shortly thereafter, wholly in charge of the Justice Department's responsibilities for the federal examiner and federal observer programs. But I began working in the Civil Rights Division as a law clerk in the summer of 1965, and I was there on August 6, 1965, when the Voting Rights Act became law. Shortly after the Act was passed I was assigned to accompany the many other employees of the Civil Rights Division who were working out of an office set up in the federal building in Selma, Alabama. Our primary job was to investigate the beatings suffered by people who earlier that year attempted to march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama, to protest the disenfranchisement of African Americans in Alabama.

I traveled with Civil Rights Division lawyers from county to county in West Central Alabama to determine the identity of the victims of those beatings and to interview them. As we traveled, we also got information on possible violations of the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and we stopped into the offices where federal examiners were giving African Americans their first easy, safe and fair opportunity to register vote. (Local voter registration hours and locations were so restrictive that some white people took advantage of the easy federal voter registration opportunities too.)

Those events gave rise to the issues we are addressing now, 40 years later. A discussion of these issues can easily get blurred by a numbing recitation of legal statutes, provisions and clauses, because that is how the Voting Rights Act is written. I will set out those citations later in my statement by providing sections of an article my wife and I published in the Spring 2002 edition of the Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review. But first I want to review the federal examiner and federal observer provisions of the Voting Rights Act as they applied to people and voting in the real world.

Under the structure of the Voting Rights Act, a federal examiner can be assigned to any site in the states and counties that are specially covered under the Act's formulae in Section 4, after the county has been certified by the Attorney General of the United States (or in any county certified by court order). Of course, under the structure of the Voting Rights Act, the federal examiners do not technically register people to vote; they examine applicants as to their eligibility under state voter registration laws that are otherwise Constitutional, and then put those applicants who are found to be eligible on a list. The list is given to the local county voter registrar who is required by the Voting Rights Act to enter the eligible applicants' names on the local voter registration rolls.

In the summer and fall of 1965 people were lined up day after day to take advantage of their first opportunity to register to vote. The federal examiners were Civil Service Commission investigators who had been pulled off of the routine jobs they had been doing and sent to sites in Alabama and other Southern states that had been designated by the U.S. Attorney General for federal listing. Besides listing voter applicants, the examiners were available to take complaints about listed people who had not been placed on the county voter registration rolls.

Those examiners were not, on the whole, a happy group. Their presence in small groups of two or three was obvious in town, and their work was opposed by many of white people there. In the main, they ate alone, walked alone and talked mostly to each other. The examiners were eager to know from us, on our rounds, when they would be able to go home. Still, they persevered, and in the end they accounted for the registration of tens of thousands of people who had been discriminatorily kept off of the voter registration rolls. From 1965 to 1972 federal examiners were responsible for the registration of over 170,000 voters. They achieved a signal victory in the fight against racial discrimination in voting.

As the Voting Rights Act is structured, federally registered voters have continuing protection against attempts at keeping them from voting. In any county that has been certified for a federal examiner, the Voting Rights Act authorizes the United States Office of Personnel Management (the successor to the United States Civil Rights Commission) to assign federal observers to polling places as requested by the U.S. Attorney General, to watch voting and vote counting procedures. (Note that the certification of a county for federal examiners is a prerequisite for the assignment of federal observers, but the presence of federally listed voters in the county is not.)

That protection was badly needed in the mid-1960s for newly registered African American voters as they entered the polling places and weathered the stares of white voters and the hostility of the polling place officials. Some examples of the humiliations they faced are set out later in my statement. But for now it is enough to know that they, too, persevered, and under the protective presence of the federal observers, they cast their ballots and participated in the political life of the county for the first time.

The federal observers' job is to watch and take notes. If polling place officials choose to violate their own procedures in order to humiliate racial or minority language voters, or intimidate them, or refuse to allow them the same voting privileges in the polls as the white voters, the federal observers cannot intervene. The observers in a county have co-captains who travel from polling place to polling place, checking with the observers and getting information from them. Those observer co-captains call regularly to a central office established by the Office of Personnel Management. Originally, and for many years, this central office was known as the examiner's office, which had been established for the examiner to take complaints as is required by Section 12(e) of the Voting Rights Act. In the examiner's office there also was a lawyer from the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division (usually from the Voting Section, nee Voting and Public Accommodations Section). Today, since the examiner has little or no function, especially in a county where there are no federally registered voters, the office used in the county on election day is referred to as the captain's office. The observer captain along with a Civil Rights Division attorney are there to receive the calls and the information from the observer co-captains.

When irregularities arise the Division lawyer relays the information about the irregularities to the county official in charge of the election, and allows the county official to take action to correct the irregularities. Where corrective action is not taken or is inadequate, a civil action can be filed later under the Voting Rights Act. A civil action, such as the one described below involving Conecuh County, Alabama, can use the reports of federal observers as effective and unassailable evidence of racially discriminatory actions of polling place officials. After the election the observers provide their reports to the federal examiner, the Attorney General and, if appropriate, to a federal court (if the county is certified for an examiner by a court).

The work of the federal observers as described here continued in the South largely unchanged through the 1990s. These procedures apply too, to the work of federal observers in other areas of the country with important modifications to deal with geographical differences and activities in polling places involving minority language voters.

Federal observers are necessary, federal examiners are not necessary.

Violations of the Voting Rights Act continue to happen in polling places throughout the United States. The need for federal observers to document discriminatory treatment of racial and language minority voters in the polls has not waned. The use of a thousand or more federal observers at election after election beginning in 1965 decreased to the use of hundreds of observers at elections after the early 1980s as a result of the effective enforcement of the Voting Rights Act in Southern states. But the enforcement of the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act, added in 1975, has required the use of hundreds more federal observers to disclose to Justice Department attorneys evidence of harassment of members of language minority groups, and instances where ballots and other election material and procedures are not available to those voters in a language they can understand. The result is that between 300 and 600 federal observers continued to be needed annually from 1984 to 2000.

The facts supplied by federal observers to Civil Rights Division attorneys are crucial and irreplaceable in the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act. Most parts of the voting process are open to the public, and the evidence of Voting Rights Act violations that are involved in the voting process can be obtained by Justice Department lawyers through routine investigations. But most state laws limit access to polling places on election day, allowing only voters and polling place officials to remain in the polls (police are allowed too when called to deal with disturbances). Thus, unless an exception is made in these rules to allow federal investigators to get special access to the polls, the harassment of racial and minority language voters and other violations of the Voting Rights Act inside the polling places would go unseen and unchecked.

Federal observers have special access to polling places under the authority of the Voting Rights Act even where access to Justice Department attorneys is otherwise barred. Federal observers thus become the attorneys' eyes and ears. The discriminatory treatment of racial and minority language voters witnessed by the federal observers, as discussed in detail below, runs the gamut from actions that make those voters feel uncomfortable by talking rudely to them, or ridiculing their need for assistance in casting their ballot, to actions that bar them from voting, such as failing to find their names on the lists of registered voters and refusing to allow them to vote on provisional ballots, or misdirecting them to other polling places.

Minority language voters suffer additional discriminatory treatment when people who speak only English are assigned as polling place workers in areas populated by minority language voters. The polling place workers fail to communicate the voting rules and procedures to the voters, or fail to respond to the voters' questions. In some instances, qualified registered voters have been told that they are not permitted to vote because they have not furnished necessary information, such as their address, even when they have provided the information; the poll worker was unable to understand what the voters were saying, but a speaker of the minority language would have understood.

Civil Rights Division lawyers who receive facts from federal observers about violations of the Voting Rights Act provide those facts directly to the election officials in the jurisdictions involved, allowing them to take corrective action in compliance with the Act. In other instances, those facts are used to secure court orders requiring that the jurisdictions involved to comply with the dictates of the Voting Rights Act. In either approach, the end result fulfills the goal of the Voting Rights Act to allow United States citizens to cast their ballots on election day freely and fairly, without distinction because of their race or membership in a language minority group.

That the work of the federal observers is a part of a law enforcement effort—the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act—is especially true where the information from the federal observers is provided in the context of a lawsuit, where a court has certified a county that was not specially covered under the Voting Rights Act. In that situation, the information is given to the court and affects the position of the parties (the Justice Department and the county) with respect to the actions the jurisdiction must take to comply with the Act (the relief that is ordered in the case). Some local election officials have come to welcome the information obtained by federal observers as an additional source showing the extent to which the county's polling place officials are complying with the provisions of the Voting Rights Act.

However, the initial assignment of federal observers to a county today remains dependant on the certification of the county for the assignment of federal examiners even though federal examiners are largely unnecessary any more for listing voter applicants. There has been no federal listing of voters since the 1970s, apart from an isolated flurry of voter listing in Georgia in 1982 and another isolated flurry in Mississippi in 1983. Discriminatory actions against racial and language minority group members are not caused by their status as federally registered voters. And examiners no longer receive complaints on election day with respect to federally listed voters. I do not recall any complaints that were received centering on mistreatment of federally listed voters over the last 20 years of my supervision of the federal observer and examiner programs, and few, if any such complaints before that. (Complaints about other matters are made to the examiner, but they routinely involve matters for which the federal observers have been assigned to the county, and are just as easily, and more effectively fielded by the federal observer captain in the county.) Moreover, the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act and the enactment of new easy voter registration laws, such as the National Voter Registration Act (the motor voter law), have made the possibility of future listings by federal examiners highly unlikely.

Further, the Office of Personnel Management must continue to keep the lists of federally listed voters up to date regarding changes of name, changes of address and, as the years have gone by, of deaths. Those voters cannot be removed from the voter rolls without the approval of the Office of Personnel Management, and the lists continued to be provided for election day use by those counties where there are federally listed voters. In fact, these lists are no longer used for any practical purpose, and their maintenance should be discontinued.

It is possible that federal examiners may be needed in the future for voter listing in a situation where the dictates of the Voting Rights Act are met, so the Voting Rights Act's authorization for federal examiners to conduct listing activity should be retained. But there is no reason to continue to tie the assignment of federal observers to the appointment of a federal examiner. I believe that, apart from the possible need for listing voters, the federal examiner provisions are outdated and are no longer needed in the Voting Rights Act, especially the requirement that an examiner be appointed as a prerequisite for the assignment of federal observers to a county.

But the procedure for the certification of a county for federal examiners under Section 6 of the Act serves an important purpose: it requires the Justice Department to conduct an intensive investigation to support the certification, and thus makes the federal government responsible for taking action regarding local election procedures only on the basis of complete and compelling facts. I believe that some manner of certification should remain a prerequisite for the initial assignment of federal observers to a county and, once certified, that a county would remain certified, as is now the case, until it acted to eliminate the certification (the formula under Section 13 for terminating certification would be changed).

If such a new certification procedure would be instituted, the requirement that the United States Attorney General personally must sign the certification, as is now the case, would be unnecessary. This authority for executing a certification should be allowed to be delegated to the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. To my recollection, the Attorney General has signed every certification that has been recommended by the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. Nor would the Attorney General's signature be needed any more to assure the importance of the certification if the only consequence of a certification would be simply to allow federal observers to witness polling place procedures. The delegation to the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights of the responsibility for a certifying a county for the presence of federal observers would be similar to the delegation of authority to the Assistant Attorney General to object to changes in voting practices and procedures under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

The purpose of the present requirement in the Voting Rights Act that the Attorney General's certification of a county be published in the Federal Register is to give notice of the location of the federal examiner's office. Since it no longer will be necessary to have an office for a federal examiner when federal observers are assigned, the publication of the location of that office also will be unnecessary. Those who will most need to know of the assignment of federal observers—county officials and minority group representatives—always are informed personally by Civil Rights Division attorneys, and other members of the community easily learn of the observers' presence from Division attorneys, local press reporting and word of mouth.

Accordingly, I believe that the federal observer provision is still necessary to the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, but the Voting Rights Act no longer should tie the assignment of federal observers to the appointment of a federal examiner. The Act should allow a certification function, newly directed only to the assignment of federal observers, to be delegated to the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. The requirement for publication of the certification in the Federal Register—an adjunct of the federal examiner function—should be eliminated as a prerequisite to the initial assignment of federal observers.

Federal observers' work should continue to be a law enforcement function.

I also recommend that the function of the federal observers remain as it is: as witnesses in a law enforcement function. The question arises because, since my retirement, I have been an observer four times in other countries as a part of an international observer corps assembled by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) under its Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR). The forms these observers use list polling place procedures and have a place for the observer's rating from good to bad (1 to 3, or 1 to 5) for each procedure. There are separate forms for the opening of the polls, for voting during the day, and for the closing of the polls. A fourth form allows for fuller explanation of any item or event.

The object of the observation by ODIHR is to report information for public consumption as quickly as possible. During election day the observers send their forms to ODIHR headquarters in the country's capitol at mid-morning, shortly after noon, and just before the polls close; the remaining forms are dropped off when the observers return from the vote count to their regional lodging sites throughout the country. This way, by the afternoon of election day OSCE/ODHIR knows how the election is going, whether there are serious problems, and if so, what they are and where they are. Then, on the morning after the election, OSCE issues its judgment on whether the election was conducted according to international standards or was marred by irregularities.

But OSCE is not a law enforcement organization, and its approach would not be appropriate to the job of the Justice Department. Some of the irregularities that the federal observers can witness are not dissimilar from the kind of procedural irregularities that are common to elections held in emerging democracies. The extra identification steps required of Arab Americans in Hamtramck, Michigan, and the harassment they encountered, described below, are an example. But the similarity of some situations to those addressed by international observer groups such as the OSCE does not argue for redesigning the federal observer program under the Voting Rights Act to resemble those organizations' efforts.

In fact, the federal observer program is an effective law enforcement program as it is now constituted. If observers are desired to watch polling place activities for other purposes, those functions should be performed by other observers serving other functions. "Domestic" observers in other countries are allowed into the polling places to get information for their candidates, or political parties, or organizations, and routinely publicize the activities they witness. Those countries' elections, however, are conducted centrally, by a central (in the U.S. it would be a federal) election commission, and the observers' activities are under that central control. The laws of those countries specifically allow domestic as well as international observers into the polling places. The observers are granted permission to be in the polls and are issued identification tags for that purpose by the central or district election commissions, which can withdraw that permission at any time.

This kind of observation is not a matter within the purview of existing federal legislation in this country, and to have federal legislation allowing these kinds of observers in polling places a record would have to be established by the United States Congress justifying their presence in connection with federal elections. On the other hand, in the United States access to the polling places is controlled by state law, and some states allow such observers into the polling places now. States routinely also allow the press into the polls to witness the activities there. Finally, redacted versions of the federal observers' report forms may be obtained under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) subject to the FOIA rules and the Privacy Act.

The following analysis provides the specific support for my conclusion that the federal observer provision of the Voting Rights Act should be continued because it is clearly needed to provide the Justice Department with evidence of violations of the Voting Rights Act's prohibitions against discrimination in the polling places against racial and language minority group members. This analysis is taken from an article my wife and I wrote for the Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review, Spring 2002 edition, Vol. 2, Number 11.

The special provisions of the Voting Rights Act were compelled by resistance to African Americans' voting rights.

Congress had found that case-by-case litigation was inadequate to combat widespread and persistent discrimination in voting, because of the inordinate amount of time and energy required to overcome the obstructionist tactics invariably encountered in these lawsuits. After enduring nearly a century of systematic resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress might well decide to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victims.

South Carolina v. Katzenbach, supra at 328.

The Voting Rights Act (the "Act") cut through the protective barrier of federalism with two important sections. Section 5 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c (the "preclearance" provision), required federal review of any new voting procedures that states and counties might adopt. This prohibited the adoption of new discriminatory practices when a jurisdiction's present practices were found to be unlawful. And Section 4 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b, instantly led to the enfranchisement of thousands of people by suspending the use of literacy tests and similar discriminatorily applied barriers to the registration of African Americans in the Deep South.¹ Some states, such as Virginia, immediately stopped using literacy tests. In other Southern states, federal examiners were appointed under Section 6 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973d, assigned to counties to conduct fair voter registration under Section 7 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973e, when white county officials refused to stop their racially discriminatory voter registration practices.² This was no small task, as over 170,000 people were registered between 1965 and 1972 through the efforts of the federal examiners, mostly in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi. Semiannual Report of Cumulative Totals on Voting Rights Examining as of

¹ These "tests or devices" were suspended in states and counties determined by a formula in Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b, based on the use of literacy tests and other pre-application devices (such as having current voters vouch for your good moral character), and low voter turnout. Later, this provision was made permanent and nationwide. 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa. Originally, states and counties covered under the formula in Section 4 of the Act could terminate their special coverage ("bail out") after five years by showing in a lawsuit before a three-judge court in the federal district court for the District of Columbia, that no test or device had been used to deprive anyone of the right to vote during that period. Since the Act itself suspended those tests or devices for only 5 years, it was thought that it would be relatively simple for states and counties who complied with the suspension to bail out after the 5-year period. In 1970 the time period in Section 4 was extended to 10 years, in 1975 it was extended to 17 years. In 1982 the approach was changed, and the special coverage under Section 4 will expire 25 years after August 5, 1984, the effective date of the 1982 Amendments, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(a)(8). In 1982 the bail-out provisions were amended substantially to allow individual counties within a fully covered state to bail out, and to set out a number of specific qualifications that a jurisdiction needs to meet in order to bail out. 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(a)(1)-(3).

² The examiners are commonly referred to as federal registrars. These were people appointed by the head of the Civil Service Commission, now the Office of Personnel Management, to examine voter applicants as to their qualifications under state law. If the applicants satisfied the state requirements, their names were put on a list that was given to the county registrar, who then had to add them to the county voter registration rolls. In this way, some semblance of state authority over the voter registration process was preserved: registrars satisfied state requirements, and a state-authorized official put the voters' names on the rolls. 42 U.S.C. § 1973e(b). To safeguard against discriminatory purges of those newly enfranchised voters, their names cannot be purged from the voter rolls without the approval of the Office of Personnel Management. 42 U.S.C. § 1973e(d).

December 31, 2000, Prepared by the Office of Workforce Information, Office of Merit Systems Oversight and Effectiveness, U.S. Office of Personnel Management. See Appendix A for the number of people, by state, registered by federal examiners.

Further, in order to allow the U.S. Attorney General to know whether discriminatory action was taken against the newly enfranchised voters in the polling places on election day, Section 8 of the Act allowed that, whenever an examiner has been appointed,

[T]he Director of Personnel Management may assign, at the request of the Attorney General, one or more persons, who may be officers of the United States, (1) to enter and attend at any place for holding an election...for the purpose of observing whether persons who are entitled to vote are being permitted to vote, and (2) to enter and attend at any place for tabulating the votes cast at any election...for the purpose of observing whether votes cast by persons entitled to vote are being properly tabulated.

Thus, the use of federal observers in polling places initially was directed at protecting the rights of new voters who had been registered by federal examiners. Even though federal voter registration was rare after 1972, the predicate under the Voting Rights Act for assigning federal observers has not changed: federal observers continued to be allowed only in counties that had been certified by the U.S. Attorney General for federal examiners. As a result, to allow the assignment of federal observers to a county, the county had to be certified by the U.S. Attorney General or a federal court (under Section 3(c) of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973a(c)) for federal examiners.³ The assignment of federal observers continues to be a cornerstone of the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act. Over 23,000 federal observers have been assigned to monitor polling place procedures since 1966, 4,393 since 1990 alone.⁴ See Appendix B, Assignment of Federal Observers Under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973f, by Year and State.

⁴ There were 4,698 federal observers assigned to polling places in 5 states from 1966 through 1969; 7,034 federal observers were assigned to 9 states in the 1970s; 6,598 federal observers were assigned to 11 states in the 1980s, and 3,753 federal observers were assigned to 13 states in the 1990s. In 2000, 640 federal observers were assigned to 11 states. See, Appendix B.

Federal observers were able to note and document a wide variety of discriminatory actions that were taken against African Americans in the polls. Some of these actions were insulting and direct, as are reflected in the United States' responses to interrogatories in United States v. Conecuh County, Alabama, Civil Action No. 83-1201-H (S.D. Ala., Jun 12, 1984).⁵ See Appendix C.

While providing assistance to a black voter, white poll official Albrecht asked, "Do you want to vote for white or niggers?" The voter stated that he wanted to give everyone a fair chance. Albrecht proceeded to point out the black candidates and, with respect to one white candidate, stated, "This is who the blacks are voting for." Poll official Albrecht made further reference to black citizens as "niggers" in the presence of federal observers, including a statement that "niggers don't have principle enough to vote and they shouldn't be allowed. The government lets them do anything."

Plaintiff's Response to Interrogatories and Request for Production of Documents, p. 6.

White poll workers treated African American voters very differently from the respectful, helpful way in which they treated white voters. When questions arose about the voter registration data for a white person, such as a person's address or date of registration, or when a white person's name was not immediately found on the poll books, the voter was addressed as Mister or Misses, was treated with respect, and the matter was resolved on the spot. If the voter's name was not found, often he or she either was allowed to vote anyway, with his or her name added to the poll book, or the person was allowed to vote a provisional or challenged ballot, which would be counted later if the person were found to be properly registered. If, however, the voter was black, the voter was addressed by his or her first name and either was sent away from the polls without voting, or told to stand aside until the white people in line had voted. African American voters were not allowed to take sample ballots into the polls, and were made to vote without those aids (it was claimed by white officials that the sample ballots were campaign material which was prohibited inside the polls).

African American voters who were unable to read and write, due in large part to inferior segregated schools and the need to go to work in the fields at an early age, were refused their request to have someone help them mark their ballot, notwithstanding the Voting Rights Act's bar on literacy tests. In some instances, white poll workers would loudly announce the African American voter's inability to read or write, embarrassing the voter in front of his or her neighbors. Some white poll workers went so far as to bring a magnifying glass to the polls, and give it to African American voters, challenging the voter to read using the magnifying glass in front of everyone present at the polling place. Illiterate white voters, on the other hand, were allowed assistance by a person of their choice without comment. White couples routinely were allowed to enter the voting booth together to mark their ballots.

In instances where African American voters were allowed an assistor in the booth, arbitrary rules were concocted that limited the number of voters an assistor could help, or made the assistor wait outside the polling place, requiring the voter to enter the polls alone and negotiate alone the sign-in procedures administered by unfriendly white poll workers, before being allowed to ask that the assistor be allowed to help.⁶ All too often, when the voter said he or she needed assistance the white poll worker would proceed to help the voter, and not give the voter a chance to ask for the assistor the voter wanted; the voter did not know if the poll worker cast the ballot as the voter desired, and had no confidence that the ballot was cast correctly.

Moreover, racial discrimination in the polls is not limited to African Americans, and is not limited to the South. On November 2, 1999, in the City of Hamtramck, Michigan, the qualifications of more than 40 voters were challenged on grounds that they were not citizens. They were challenged by members of a group known as Citizens for a Better Hamtramck (CCBH), organized to keep elections pure. As described in the Consent Order and Decree in United States v. City of Hamtramck, Civil Action No. 00-73541 (E.D. Mich, Aug 7, 2000),

6. ... Some voters were challenged before they signed their applications to vote. Other voters were challenged after they had signed their applications and their names had been announced. The challenged voters had dark skin and distinctly Arabic names, such as Mohamed, Ahmed, and Ali. The challengers did not appear to possess or consult any papers or lists to determine whom to challenge.

7. Once challenged, the city election inspectors required the challenged voters to swear that they were American citizens before permitting them to vote. Voters who were not challenged were not required to do so. The city election inspectors did not evaluate the propriety of merit of the challenges. Some dark-skinned voters produced their American passports to identify themselves to election officials. Nevertheless, these persons were challenged by CCBH, and the election inspectors required them to take a citizenship oath as a prerequisite to

⁶ After the Voting Rights Act enabled African Americans in the Deep South to register to vote, it became common for civil rights workers and local African American residents to drive the new voters to the polls and to give assistance to those who needed it. This was a natural outgrowth of the organizing required during the civil rights movement to achieve voter registration for black people. It provided transportation—many people did not have cars—and gave confidence and protection to these newly enfranchised voters at the polling places from which they had so recently been excluded by white poll workers and voters who did not want them there. This tradition of “hauling” voters to the polls and giving assistance to voters who need it continues today, especially in many rural areas.

The consent decree also states that city officials were apprised of the incidents, that they consulted with state election officials who were present in Hamtramck on election day, but neither the state nor the city election officials prevented the baseless challenges from continuing. It was claimed that other Arab-American citizens may have heard about the incidents and decided not to go to the polls to vote that day.

Federal observers witnessed clear discrimination against language minority group members at the polls.

Besides discriminatory treatment of citizens based on race, citizens who speak English poorly, or not at all, have faced obstacles to voter registration and voting. In 1975 Congress took note of discrimination against people who have only a limited ability to speak English. For them, printing or providing information only in English as effective as a literacy test in keeping them from registering to vote or casting an effective ballot. Such disenfranchisement was outlawed when the Voting Rights Act was amended and expanded in 1975. The terms of Section 4 of the Act, containing the formula for applying special coverage to counties, were changed to include among prohibited tests and devices,

[T]he practice or requirement by which any State or political subdivision provided any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance or other material or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, only in the English language, where the Director of the Census determines that more than five per centum of the citizens of voting age residing in such State or political subdivision are members of a single language minority.

42 U.S.C. § 1973b(f)(3). Language minorities are defined in the Voting Rights Act as American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives, and people of Spanish heritage. 42 U.S.C. § 19731(c)(3). Political subdivisions as defined in the Act usually are counties. 42 U.S.C. § 19731(c)(2).⁷

Counties in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah were certified for federal examiners, and federal observers were assigned to document the extent to which the English language was used in areas where many of the voters spoke Native American languages but understood English only marginally. Similarly, federal observers have been assigned to polling places in Spanish language areas of Arizona, Texas, New Jersey and New York City, and Chinese language areas of New York City, and San Francisco and Oakland, California.⁹ In all these areas minority language citizens were allowed to register to vote, but the use of the English language instead of the voters' first language prevented them from understanding the voting instructions and the ballot. Polling place workers either were not able to speak the language of the voters, or if they could, were not trained to translate the documents and procedures into the language of the voters. By the 1990s federal observers were assigned to monitor discrimination against language minority group members in numbers equal to the federal observers assigned to monitor non-language racial discrimination.¹⁰

The need for the language minority provisions of the Voting Right Act continues to be demonstrated in areas of the country where English is not persons' primary language. Normally one would assume that polling place workers would be chosen from the population where the polling place is located, and that they would speak another language in addition to English with the same frequency as the voters. In many instances, however, this did not happen. For example, in ethnically changing neighborhoods in New York City, the choices of the political party apparatus resulted in the repeated appointment of English-speaking poll workers where a large portion of the new voters in a precinct were Spanish-speaking Puerto Ricans. In Passaic, New Jersey, English-speaking poll workers were unable to find the names of Spanish-speaking voters

⁸ A parallel requirement was added in Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act in 1975 for counties determined by different formula. 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1a. Section 203 of the Act does not include the other special provisions of Section 4, such as the preclearance, federal examiner and federal observer provisions. Lawsuits under Section 203 must be brought before a three-judge court. As a result of amendments since 1975, coverage under Section 203 now applies to counties that have more than 5 percent of voting age citizens who are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; have more than 10,000 voting age citizens who are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; or have a part of an Indian reservation, and more than 5 percent of the American Indian or Alaska Native voting age citizens are members of a single language minority and are limited-English proficient; and the illiteracy rate of the language minority group citizens is higher than the national illiteracy rate. 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1(a)(2). The counties covered under the language minority provisions of Sections 4 and 203 are listed in the Appendix to 28 U.S.C. Part 55.

¹⁰ From 1990 through 2000, there were 2,449 federal observers assigned to elections in the states of the Deep South, very few of which involved discrimination against language minority group members, and there were 2,215 federal observers assigned to monitor elections in other areas of the country, most of which involved discrimination against language minority group members. See Appendix B.

in the polls books because the poll workers did not know that the voters' family name traditionally was the second of three names they used. Some voters were denied the ballot because they identified their street name according to common Spanish usage rather than the formal English name.¹¹ In Texas and Southern Arizona polling places Hispanic voters were admonished not to use Spanish when talking in the polling places and when giving assistance to voters who needed help when voting. Moreover, the citizenship of Hispanic voters was questioned at the polls, with voters being required to somehow provide on-the-spot evidence of their citizenship before being given a ballot; such evidence was not required of Anglo voters.¹²

Evidence of other kinds of discriminatory behavior of polling place workers and others toward Spanish language voters inside the polls is provided in the reports of the Independent Elections Monitor appointed in September 2000 by the court in a consent decree in United States v. Passaic City, New Jersey, and Passaic County, New Jersey, Civil Action No. 99-2544 (NHP) (D.N.J., Sep. 5, 2000)(three-judge court).

At P.S. 6, observers called to report that the challenger was making racist remarks about Hispanics. At the Ukrainian school, challengers became very aggressive and were yelling at voters, stating that they did not live in the country and should not vote. Ironically, many of these challenged voters were off-duty Passaic City police officers. Angel Casabona, Jr. was one such challenged police officer who avoided confrontation and properly came to Passaic City Hall to have his voting status clarified. Escorted by the City Clerk and investigators from the prosecutor's office, Mr. Casabona reentered the polling site and was permitted to exercise his vote. The brazen challenger was reprimanded and board workers were reminded that challengers should not be interacting with voters.

The most disturbing incident of the [June 26, 2001 municipal primary election] occurred at the polling place at St. Mary's School in Passaic. Someone allegedly stole the flag from outside the polling place. The police were called. An officer responded and caught the purported perpetrator. The Officer entered the polling place and asked who had called the police. No one responded. The officer barked comments in substance to the poll workers as follows, "Can't you read? What country do you come from?" When a municipal worker of Indian origin came to see what the problem was, the officer then asked, "And what country do you come from?" When a Latino federal observer tried to explain the dictates of the consent decree, the officer asked for credentials. When the observer showed his credentials, the officer found them inadequate because they lacked a picture and detained the observer. The Officer told the observer, "I could arrest you for this." Upon being alerted to the controversy, I asked investigators from the Passaic County Prosecutors Office and Deputy Chief of the Passaic County Police Department to intercede. When a Sergeant from the Passaic Police department responded at the scene and learned what had happened, he apologized to the federal observer and told him he thought some sensitivity training might be in order for the officer. Notably, this discriminatory behavior took place in a city where the Latino population is at 62%. Intolerance in the city is still existent and hiding under color of official right.

¹¹ Mail addressed to streets using the Spanish nickname was delivered because the postal personnel were familiar with the local Spanish language usages, as the poll workers were not.

¹² Anglo candidates compiled lists of Hispanic voters' names for their poll watchers to challenge at the polls on the ground that the voters were not citizens. United States citizenship is required by every state as a qualification to register to vote in state and federal elections. But in order to avoid discriminatory treatment of voters at the polls and disrupting the polling places with election-day challenges, persons who, before an election, have evidence that a registered voter is not a U.S. citizen should be required to present that information to the voter registrar, and to desist from interposing challenges at the polls to voters whose qualifications have been upheld by the registrar.

Walter F. Timpone, Office of the Election Monitor, Sixth Report, July 27, 2001, pp. 6-7.

The use of English rather than Chinese in polling places in Chinese neighborhoods of San Francisco and Oakland (Alameda County), California, and New York City left voters confused about procedures, and ignorant of ballot propositions and contested offices. As was noted in the Settlement Agreement and Order in United States v. Alameda County, California, C95 1266 (N.D. Cal, Jan 22, 1996)(three-judge court),

According to the 1990 Census, the population of Alameda County includes 68,184 Chinese Americans and 30,120 Chinese American citizens of voting age. The 1990 Census reports that 11,394 persons, or 37.83 percent of the Chinese citizen voting age population in Alameda County, and 1.3 percent of the total citizen voting age population in Alameda County do not speak English well enough to participate effectively in English language elections. Thus, over 11,000 Chinese American citizens in Alameda County cannot function effectively in the electoral process except in the Chinese language.

Problems were compounded in Native American areas of Arizona, New Mexico and Utah. The problems faced by Native Americans in these areas are illustrated in Cibola County, New Mexico, which contains the Ramah Chapter of the Navajo Reservation and the Acoma and Laguna Pueblos. The Stipulation and Order in United States v. Cibola County, New Mexico, No. Civ 93 1134 LH/LFG, (D.N.M., Apr 21, 1994)(three-judge court), states that,

5. According to the 1990 Census, 57.8 percent of the Navajo voting age population and 18.1 percent of the Pueblo voting age population in Cibola County do not speak English well enough to participate effectively in English language elections. Thus, a significant proportion of the Native American population of Cibola County, and a significant majority of Navajos, cannot function in the electoral process except in the Navajo or Keresan languages.

6. The Navajo and Keres populations of Cibola County live in circumstances of significant isolation from the non-Native American population of the county. Cibola County is unusually large in physical terms, and covers a geographic area roughly the size of the State of Connecticut. Over four-fifths of the non-Native American population lives clustered within or near the adjacent incorporated communities of Grants and Milan, close to the county courthouse. The Acoma and Laguna population centers are between 25 and 50 miles away from Grants, the county seat, while the Ramah Chapter House is approximately 50 miles from Grants. The isolation of the Native American population of Cibola County burdens their access to the franchise.

8. Native American citizens living within Cibola County, suffer from a history of discrimination touching their right to register, to vote, and otherwise to participate in the political process. Until 1948, Native American citizens of New Mexico were not permitted to vote in state and local elections. Trujillo v. Garley, C.A. No. 1350 (D.N.M., August 11, 1948). In 1984, the court in Sanchez v. King, C.A. No. 82-0067-M (D.N.M. 1984) held that the New Mexico state legislative redistricting plan discriminated against Native Americans.

9. The level of political participation by Native American citizens of Cibola County is depressed. Voter registration rates in the predominantly Native American precincts have been less than half the rate in non-Native American precincts, and Native Americans are affected disproportionately by voter purge procedures. Although Native Americans comprise over 38 percent of the county population, fewer than eight percent of all absentee ballots have been from the predominantly Native American precincts. There is a need for election information in the Navajo and Keresan languages, and a need for publicity concerning all phases of the election process for voters in Ramah, Acoma and Laguna. The rate of participation by Native Americans on such issues is less than one third of the participation rate among non-Native Americans. There is a need for polling places staffed with trained translators conveniently situated for the Native American population.

The remedy for this unlawful disparity is complicated by the facts that (1) the Navajo and Pueblo languages are oral, not written, and (2) there are no equivalent terms in the Navajo and Pueblo languages for many words and phrases in the election process.

Native American polling place workers in reservation precincts faced a more difficult task than white poll workers in getting to the training session for poll workers that were held many miles away in county seats where most white people lived. At the training sessions Native American poll workers were given little or no instruction about how to translate ballots and propositions, and many of their attempts to do so on election day resulted in the most rudimentary references. For example, poll workers assisting voters at the polls would refer to the office of secretary of state as someone who works in the state capitol, and bond levies for education were said simply to be increases in taxes. Many times the Native American poll workers found it so difficult to figure out how to explain items on the ballot they just instructed the voters to skip the offices or propositions. Moreover, Native American voters who had been purged from the voter rolls because they failed to respond to written notices they either did not receive¹³ or did not understand, were turned away from the polls with no explanation of why they were not able to vote, and were given no opportunity to re-register there.¹⁴

Pre-election investigation can pinpoint where federal observers should be assigned.

The task of assuring compliance by polling place workers with appropriate polling place procedures requires (1) knowledge of what is happening in the polling places, and (2) the authority to correct actions that are in violation of the prescribed procedures. For over 35 years DOJ has been determining, before each election, what will happen in specific polling places in particular counties in states far from Washington, D.C. Based on this information DOJ determined at which polling places discriminatory activity would take place, and the exact number of federal observers needed at each particular polling place, from among the hundreds of counties in the 16 states that are fully or partially covered under Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act,¹⁵ and the 10 additional jurisdictions in other states that have been and remain certified by courts under Section 3 of the Act.¹⁶

This DOJ effort, known as a pre-election survey, is conducted by the Voting Section of DOJ's Civil Rights Division. Pre-election surveys began right after the Voting Rights Act was enacted, as a tool for determining where and how many federal observers would need to be assigned under Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act. Through the years

¹⁴ Voters were confused because they voted in tribal elections without problem, and were not told, for example, that under state law they had been purged from the county voter rolls because they did not vote with some particular frequency and in particular elections, such as every two or four years in general elections. To add to the confusion, in many areas the tribal elections and the state elections were held on different dates but at the same locations. Prior to the National Voter Registration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg et seq., voter registration in many counties in Indian country was conducted in the county seat, far from reservation housing, until, in some instances, litigation required that deputy registrars be made available at reservation sites, and that voter purge procedures be modified to allow fair notice to Native American voters. United States v. State of Arizona, CIV 88-1989 PHX EHC (D. Ariz., May 22, 1989), pgs. 6-11; First Amended Consent Decree, Jan. 3, 1994, pgs. 5-10.

the pre-election surveys have remained relatively unchanged for determining where racially discriminatory actions (as contrasted with language-based difficulties) would occur in the polling places of the Deep South. This process is instructive on a broad level because it can be used, with variations, by states throughout the country to determine, prior to election day, where problems will occur on election day in polling places across the state.

The DOJ focus during the pre-election surveys is to find circumstances that are likely to lead to actions that will disadvantage voters in the polls on election day. To allow black voters to vote without interference in the South, the Voting Section focuses on counties where black candidates are facing white candidates. Those are the circumstances where experience has shown that polling place workers are more apt to take actions that deprive African American of their right to vote. Moreover, the inclination of polling place workers to take discriminatory action against African American voters is more likely when the black candidates have a real chance of beating white opponents. (For concerns about other kinds of problems at the polls, the pre-election survey would focus on the facts and antipathies relating to those problems.)

The surveys consist of two rounds of telephone calls and a field investigation. The first round of phone calls begins about six weeks before the election, which is a time when candidate qualifying has been completed and campaigning has been in progress. The Voting Section contacts the election director in each county where the minority population is about 20% or more, since a relatively small but concentrated portion of a county's population can be a significant proportion of a single election district in a county. The Voting Section determines a number of facts from each county election official they contact, including the name and race of the candidates, the office each is contesting, which candidates are incumbents, the county's procedures for appointing polling place workers, and the county's procedures for responding to problems that arise on election day. The second round of telephone calls is made to at least two African American people in each county who are familiar with the way elections have been conducted in the county during recent elections, who know who the candidates are and how the candidates have been conducting their campaigns, and who are knowledgeable about relationships between the races in the county and whether there have been any recent racial incidents in the county.

Voting Section attorneys then travel to the counties where the facts from the two rounds of telephone calls indicate that the assignment of federal observers is needed because poll workers will make it difficult for black voters to cast their ballots for the candidates of their choice. The attorneys interview the county election officials, the county sheriff (or chief of police, if a city election is in issue), African American county residents, including people associated with community and civil rights organizations, and candidates. The attorneys relay their information and their recommendation as to whether federal observers should be assigned for the election, and, if so, number and placement of federal observers that will be needed on election day, to a Voting Section supervisor who coordinates the survey.¹⁷ The polling places that are selected for the assignment of observers are (1) those at which the facts show that African American voters are likely to be victimized on election day, where (2) the county has no effective way to either know what is happening in the polls, or for responding to problems that occur at the polls, or both.

During the pre-election surveys the Voting Section supervising attorney talks frequently with the Voting Rights Coordinator at the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) who recruits and supervises the people who serve as observers.¹⁸ Thus, OPM is aware of the identity of the counties that are the subject of field investigations, and of the recommendations of the attorneys for the assignment, numbers and poll location of federal observers. Because of the ongoing coordination between the Voting Section and OPM, the federal observers are chosen and are ready to depart for their assigned location the moment a final decision is made by the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights as to the numbers and placement of the observers.¹⁹

Information from federal observers is obtained quickly and effectively on election day.

The pre-election process not only gives DOJ information it needs to determine where and how many federal observers will be needed on election day, it puts DOJ lawyers in contact with county election officials before the election, and the DOJ lawyers inform the county officials of the problems that DOJ has found out may occur in the county's polls on election day. This contact continues during the election, as the DOJ lawyers provide the county election officials with information the lawyers get from the observers.

¹⁸ Federal observers are assigned and supervised by the Office of Personnel Management. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973f. OPM centralized the observer program in the OPM office in Atlanta, Georgia, over the past several years. Beginning in 2002 the program will be centralized in the OPM office in Denver, Colorado.

There is no standing group of people who are federal observers. Rather, the people chosen to serve as federal observers at a particular election are volunteers, usually from among the OPM nationwide staff except when special abilities are required, such as Native American language ability. General training sessions are held for observers and observer supervisors at selected sites during the year. Often people will volunteer to serve as observers in election after election, but they are not always available because of the demands of their regular work assignments and prior obligations. Because of the need to recruit observers for each election, and the logistical requirements of transportation (airplane tickets, rental car) and lodging, the OPM coordinator and the Voting Section supervising attorney are in contact throughout the year to discuss observer needs in upcoming elections.

¹⁹ If a county for which federal observers is recommended has not been certified yet for federal examiners, a separate recommendation for certification of the county is made to the U.S. Attorney General, and a certification form is prepared for the U.S. Attorney General's signature. Also, because certifications are effective upon publication in the Federal Register, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(b), arrangements are made for publication as soon as possible after the U.S. Attorney General signs the certification. Similar arrangements are made by OPM which must publish in the Federal Register a location for an examiner's office. 42 U.S.C. § 1973e(a).

The observers are briefed by DOJ attorneys and the observer captain on the day before the election. The observers get to their assigned polling place one-half hour before the poll opens, and usually will remain until the last person leaves the poll. They have pre-printed forms on which to record the activity in the polls. Observers usually also attend the ballot count and record the number of votes received by each candidate.

During election day an observer supervisor makes repeated visits to the polling places where federal observers are stationed, and remains in constant telephone contact with the DOJ attorney who is in the county. This gives the DOJ attorney in the county a constant flow of information throughout the day about activities that transpire inside the polls.²⁰ When the federal observers inform the DOJ attorney of actions of polling place officials that the attorney concludes are interfering with the voting rights of African Americans, the DOJ attorney gives the facts to the local official in charge of the election, which allows him or her to stop the discriminatory activity. Local officials also can use this information after the election to take steps to prevent the incidents from happening again.

Similar steps are taken on election day when federal observers are used to determine compliance with the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act, but normally the pre-election preparation is different. The inability or lack of desire of poll workers to provide information to non-English speaking voters usually does not depend on the identity of the candidates or the issues involved in a particular election. Thus, the information obtained in one election will allow a determination of whether federal observers will be needed in the next election.²¹

The reports of these federal observers have their primary emphasis on the language aspects of polling place procedures and the actions of polling place workers. (The federal observers assigned to a particular polling place speak the minority language that is used by the voters at that polling place.) It usually is not important that the observers arrive at the opening of the polls, nor that they stay all day, since the goal is to have the observers attend the polls for a sufficient length of time to witness a number of minority language voters go through the voting process. This will give the observers sufficient facts to allow the DOJ attorneys to analyze the county's compliance with the law.

We should emphasize that the federal observers do not interfere with the election process. Their limited function, to pass along information to their OPM supervisors and the DOJ attorneys, is in accord with the dictates of Section 8 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973f. The observers must not give instructions to poll workers, must not give help to voters, and must not share their observations, judgments or opinions with individuals in the polls. They are eyes and ears. They are paid witnesses.²²

The federal observers' reports allow Justice Department attorneys to require counties to comply with their states' rules.

In its enforcement of all federal civil rights laws the Department of Justice (DOJ) attempts to obtain voluntary compliance from prospective defendants. This has been especially true of the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act where the prospective defendants are officials of state and local governments.

From the beginning of DOJ's enforcement of the Voting Rights Act DOJ lawyers personally conducted investigations in each county before examiners or observers were assigned, regularly checked on the progress of examiners while voter registration was conducted, and on election day a DOJ attorney was and continues to be present in each county to which federal observers are assigned to obtain information from the observers during election day, and debrief the observers immediately after the election. During their presence in the counties the DOJ lawyers have continuing contact with county officials, and give them the information the lawyers gain as part of their pre-election investigation in the county, and from the federal observers. Those local officials, faced with the immediate and continuing presence of DOJ lawyers, usually instruct the head worker at the polling place to follow the appropriate procedures.

The federal observers inside the polling place witness the cessation of the discriminatory action, or if the discriminatory action continues, the DOJ lawyer again brings the information from the observers to the attention of the county election official to get further corrective action. Thus, federal observers function both to gather evidence of discriminatory activities in the polling place for future legal action, and for the elimination of discriminatory actions on the spot. At times, the mere presence of federal observers at the polls serves to inhibit the tendency of many polling place workers to take discriminatory action against African American voters.

Some compulsive action is needed when county election administrators do not address outstanding problems in the polls, and do not follow proper election day procedures. A primary reason for the mistreatment of African American voters was and continues to be the failure of local election officials to appoint African Americans as polling place workers. The evidence of mistreatment that this discriminatory policy had on African American voters has provided a firm basis for court orders that required the defendants to take specific steps to recruit and hire African Americans to work in the polls. One good example of this result is the consent decree in United States v. Conecuh County, Alabama, supra, which required the defendant political party executive committees (responsible for nominating people to serve as poll workers) to "engage in affirmative recruitment efforts aimed at ensuring that the pool of persons from which nominations are made fully reflects the availability of all qualified persons in Conecuh County who are interested in serving as election officials, without regard to their race or color." at pp. 3-4.

Those recruitment efforts were required to include encouraging candidates to "seek out and propose for nomination black citizens," and "sending notices to local organizations comprised predominantly of black citizens... to advise them that the party intends to nominate persons to serve as election officials and encourage them to have interested persons notify the chairperson of the respective political party executive committee of their willingness to serve as election officials," at p. 4.

A 1993 consent order in United States v. Johnson County, Georgia, CV393-45 (S.D. Ga, Sept 14, 1993) stated that,

1. According to the 1990 Census, the total population in Johnson County is 34 percent black and the total voting age population is 29.2 percent black.

* * * * *

7. Of the one hundred thirty one individuals who were employed by Johnson County to serve as poll officials between 1988 and August 1992, eighteen (14%) were black. There were no black poll workers during this period at seven of the twelve polling places.

8. Only eight (12%) of the Sixty-six poll officials employed by Johnson County for the July 21, 1992 primary election were black. There were no black poll workers at eight of the twelve polling places.

9. Of the one hundred and six poll officials employed by Johnson County for the November 3, 1992 general election, only sixteen (15%) were black. There were no black poll workers at six of the twelve polling places.

10. No black person has ever served as a managing poll officer or an assistant managing poll officer at any of the county's polling places.

At pages 2-3.

Included in the Johnson County consent decree among the steps the defendant county commission and supervisor of election must take to have African Americans fairly represented among the polling place workers are, "sending written notices to local organizations comprised predominantly of black citizens ... to advise them that the county intends to appoint black persons to serve as poll workers and poll managers,” and “contacting black candidates and members of the political parties...to ascertain the names, addresses and telephone numbers of black citizens who are qualified and available to serve as poll officers.” Id. at 6. In addition, the defendants must publicize in local newspapers, on radio, on television and on posters their policy of conducting elections free of racial discrimination. They also must train the poll workers on how to perform their duties in a racially nondiscriminatory manner, and, with specificity, on how to deal with voters who need assistance.

Even with the specific steps set out in the 15 page Johnson County consent decree, the reports of federal observers showed that African American citizens of the Johnson County were continuing to be excluded from among the ranks of those appointed to work at the polls because the supervisor of elections did not adhere to the terms of the decree. After further discussions between the county and DOJ, in lieu of DOJ pursuing contempt of court proceedings the county appointed a biracial committee formed of county residents to perform the preliminary poll worker recruitment and nomination functions previously performed by the election supervisor, leaving her with her statutory duty of formally appointing the poll workers. (This change in practice was reviewed and precleared under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973c.) As a result, African Americans were fairly appointed among those who worked at the polls, and discrimination against African American voters at the polls abated in Johnson County, Georgia.

Both the Conecuh County and Johnson County cases show how information gathered by observers can serve as the evidentiary basis for litigation, how particular individuals at the county level can persist in discriminatory procedures in spite of state law and federal litigation, and how the identity and training of the people working inside the polling places is of primary importance in eliminating injustice from the polls. It should be remembered that in both instances the DOJ lawyers first shared their information with state and local election officials in an attempt to allow those officials to eliminate the discriminatory treatment of voters. These efforts provided the election officials with something they could obtain by themselves, but did not: information about what went wrong in their polls. The need for the resulting litigation demonstrated that those officials were not willing to stop the discriminatory conduct.

Even after the Voting Rights Act was amended in 1975 to require that areas designated under a formula must provide information and ballots in languages other than English, inadequate training of polling place workers continued to disadvantage minority language voters. The reports of federal observers gave the attorneys from the Department of Justice the information they needed to prove to county officials that violations of the Voting Rights Act had occurred, and to obtain consent decrees that set out specific steps that the counties would take to effectively provide and translate election information to Native American citizens.

Most of the consent decrees to cure discriminatory actions in Indian country under the language minority provisions of Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1a, were lengthy and set out in detail the procedures that election officials had to follow for voter education, voter registration, translation and balloting.²³ It is significant that the great majority of the provisions in the consent decrees focused on the counties' administrative responsibilities, including hiring additional county personnel, to try to give Native American voters equivalent access to information about an election and voting procedures as white people got as a matter of course, since all information was provided in English and in areas near the county seats.

Thus, the Stipulation and Order in United States v. Cibola County, New Mexico, No. Civ 93 1134 LH/LFG, (D.N.M., Apr. 21, 1994) (three-judge court), is 44 pages long, 33 pages of which is a Native American Election Information Program. This program provides that, "Cibola County shall employ at least three Native American Voting Rights Coordinators who will coordinate the Native American Election Information Program in Cibola County..." These coordinators have to be bilingual in either Navajo or Keres and English, they are to be hired only after the county consults with the tribes, they are to be trained in all aspects of the election process, they are to attend and make presentations at chapter and tribal council meetings, and perform numerous, specifically described functions that would provide election information to the Native American citizens of Cibola County.

It was and remains difficult, however, to compel obdurate county clerks and other county election administrators to perform the myriad election-connected functions in a way that meets the requirements of the court orders.²⁴ These cases argue persuasively for continuing the practice of seeking lengthy, detailed court orders that can be enforced through contempt proceedings.

²⁴ A letter of understanding was developed between DOJ and San Juan County, New Mexico, which required the county to adopt a manual of procedures to comply with the language minority requirements of the Voting Rights Act. The manual would become final after review and concurrence by DOJ. Changes in the procedures would become effective upon the concurrence of DOJ. Letters of understanding have not been widely used by DOJ in its Voting Rights Act enforcement. The letters have the advantage of getting a fast remedy and avoiding the uncertainties of litigation. The main disadvantage of using a letter of understanding is the inability to seek contempt of court sanctions if the county does not follow the steps in the letter or the county's manual of procedures. If the actions that the county fails to take are significant, a legal action would need to be filed at that time, prolonging the time for obtaining a remedy.

An alternative approach was taken in a consent decree between DOJ and Bernalillo County, New Mexico, where the court order was accompanied by a manual of procedures to comply with the language minority requirements of the Voting Rights Act. United States v. Bernalillo County, New Mexico, CV-98-156 BB/LCS (D.N.M. Apr 27, 1998). The consent decree required that the county hire a native language coordinator who is bilingual in Navajo and English, and specifically noted that, "The primary responsibility of the [native language coordinator], a full-time employee of Bernalillo County, shall be to carry out the county's Navajo language election procedures, publicity and assistance, including assisting the county to carry out the procedures in the manual..." at p. 4. The consent decree also required the county to establish a travel, supply, and telephone call budget for the native language coordinator, and subjected the county to the preclearance provision in Section 3(c) of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973a(c), which allows the county to make changes in the manual and for DOJ to review those changes to determine that they are nondiscriminatory before they can be implemented. This approach has the benefit of allowing the county to tailor its administrative procedures to its particular personnel and office situation, and of allowing practical changes to be made in the administrative procedures when necessary without having to request the three-judge court for an amendment to the court order.

Conclusion.

The federal observer provision of the Voting Rights Act continues to be extraordinarily effective in allowing the United States Department of Justice to enforce the Voting Rights Act. That provision should be extended.

The federal examiner provisions of the Voting Rights Act have accomplished their goal of allowing African American voter access to the voter rolls in areas where official resistance kept them from becoming registered voters. Those provisions have done their job and should be eliminated, especially insofar as they are prerequisites for the assignment of federal observers.

The federal observer provision of the Voting Rights Act performs an effective law enforcement function as it is written and applied. That provision should not be altered.

APPENDIX C

EXCERPTS FROM PLAINTIFF'S RESPONSE TO INTERROGATORIES AND REQUEST FOR PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS, United States v. Conecuh County, Alabama, Civil Action No. 83-1201-H (S.D. Ala., Jun 12, 1984).

A white voter waiting in line to vote stated to white poll official John P. Bewley that she was unable to obtain a yellow sample ballot distributed by the Alabama Democratic Conference. The black voter standing next in line had such a ballot. Mr. Bewley stated, "You ain't [sic] of the right color." During the same day, Mr. Bewley stated to federal observer Riddle, "See, the niggers bring in these yellow marked ballots. The nigger preachers run the niggers down here, you know. They tell them how to vote. I don't think that's right."

Poll officials instructed white registered voters to confirm their registration status in the office of the Probate Judge. Black voters whose names were not on the list were in each instance simply told that they could not vote, and were given no instruction by poll officials. White voter Salter's name did not appear on the list, and Ms. Salter acknowledged that she resided in a rural precinct and not in box 11-1. Ms. Salter nevertheless was allowed to vote an unchallenged ballot directly on the machine.

Pp. 8-9.

Ms. Lewis, who required assistance because of a vision problem, signed the poll list and stated that she wished for her companion (unidentified) to provide assistance in voting for her. White poll official Windham stated, "Can't nobody go in there with you." After a pause, Mr. Windham stated to Ms. Lewis, "you can fill out an affidavit and then she can go in with you. Can't you [read]?" Mr. Windham's tone and manner were sufficiently abrasive that Ms. Lewis left the voting place. Some moments later she was observed to remark to a companion, who was trying to persuade her to make another attempt to vote, "I've done had trouble with them twice before and I'm not begging them any more. I'm not scared but I'm not begging anybody." Ms. Lewis returned accompanied by Mr. Richard Rabb, at that time the Chair of the Conecuh county Branch of the Alabama Democratic Conference. Ms. Lewis was allowed to vote, and the poll officials provided necessary assistance with the affidavit. Ms. Lewis remind very upset and remarked, "Why couldn't they have let me vote to begin with?"

Pp. 16-17.

Black voters at box 9-1 (Old Town) were told throughout the day of the October 12, 1982 special run-off election, that no more than two voters were allowed in the polling place at one time. This restriction was imposed on 30-35 occasions. In no instance were white voters required to conform to this procedure, and the poll officials allowed a many as five white voters in the polling place at a time.

P. 21.

Ms. Stacey enforced the limitation on the amount of time a voter could spend in the booth in a random and discriminatory fashion. She enforced the limitation against black voters more frequently than against white voters. During the last hour of voting the requirement was applied exclusively against black persons. On at least two occasions she told black voters that their time had elapsed when, in fact, it had not.

P. 24

During the course of the day, poll officials addressed all black voters by their first names. Older white voters were addressed by the courtesy titles of Mr. and Ms.

P. 35

White poll official James Ellis initiated new procedures for assistance of black voters. Without notice to any person, Mr. Ellis required assistors accompanying voters into the polling place to remain 30 feet outside the polls until Mr. Ellis had finished interviewing the voter and summoned the assistor.

Pp. 36-37.

Poll officials who assisted black voters did not read the ballot to the voters or otherwise advice the voters of the contests and the candidates. They simply asked the voters, "Who do you want to vote for?"

* * * * *

Poll official Lois Stacey marked the ballot for a voter she was assisting in contests in which the voter did not express a preference.

* * * * *

Poll officials frequently served as assistors without asking voters receiving assistance who they wanted to assist them. On a number of occasions, poll officials serving as assistors did not read the complete ballot to the voters.

³² Information obtained from Jurisdictions Currently Eligible for Federal Observers as a Result of Orders Under Section 3(a) of the Voting Rights Act, United States Department of Justice, Civil Rights Division, Voting Section, October 22, 2001.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. Thank you. The gentleman's time has expired.

The panel up here is bound by the same rule as the witness panel is, and it's a 5 minute rule, so we will each have 5 minutes to ask questions at this time, and the Chair recognizes himself for that purpose.

And the question I'm going to ask—I'll just go down the line and let each of you deal with it.

And some of you have already touched on this in your testimonies obviously, but much of what we're doing is setting a record here, and so some repeating I think is probably good. It's been suggested in some of the written testimonies that the Federal Examiner Program may no longer be necessary.

Mr. Weinberg's written testimony further suggested that Congress should amend section 8 to make certification for the deployment of Federal observers independent of Federal examiners. Would each of you comment on the Federal Examiner and Observer Program and why the assistance of Federal observers is still necessary or not.

Ms. Randa?

Ms. RANDA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We play—we at OPM play a very limited support role to the Department of Justice in this program, and I have testified to the fact that the role of Examiner has evolved over the years and changed. But beyond that, I would think we would defer to the Department of Justice to make any decisions about exactly what changes should be made in the future.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. Thank you. Ms. Pew?

Ms. PEW. I can speak to the Federal Observer Program and believe that it is well worth the time spent. It is my—those are my eyes and ears inside the polling places. I have very limited examiner contact. But I can speak to the Federal Observer Program; that it has been absolutely phenomenal. It's been a great boon in our county.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. Mr. Weinberg?

Mr. WEINBERG. Thank you. I mean I think Ms. Pew's response is somewhat indicative. She's been intimately involved as a county election official with the results of the work of the Federal observers, and has no knowledge of what the Federal examiners do.

And I think that's not her fault. It's because the Federal examiners just don't do much anymore. I think OPM, if we were being candid in the back room, would say they have to maintain all these lists of federally registered voters. They have to keep them current, keep the addresses up. Mostly now, they're removing people's names from those lists of federally registered voters, because they're dying.

Yet, the counties can't take those voters off their voting rolls without an okay from the Office of Personnel Management. I mean I think to some extent it is now getting—what were protections are now getting in the way of several functions, and I think they're not needed.

As far as the certification, and you know I think observers are important. As far as how to get them into a county the first time, I do think a certification procedure is important. I think it assures everyone that there is a need for this law enforcement function to go on.

But as it stands now, the Attorney General has to personally sign the certifications. I think that's unnecessary. I think that function could be delegated to the Assistant Attorney General, much the same way as the Assistant Attorney General has authority delegated to object to voting changes under section 5 of the act, and I think that it could go on as a provision on its own.

I think it should.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. And my second question, Mr. Weinberg and Ms. Randa, if you want to comment on it, you could as well.

How does the Department of Justice determine whether Federal observers are necessary?

Mr. WEINBERG. There's sort of two tracks on that. And, you know, I must qualify everything I say by saying I haven't been at the Justice Department for almost 6 years. I don't know what's changed and what's not. I doubt that it has changed very much.

One track is where there's an investigation before the election that starts 6 weeks before an election, and is described in some detail in my extended remarks. It's an investigation. It starts out with telephone calls to local officials, to minorities who are knowledgeable in the area about election matters and devolves down to field investigation by attorneys who relay information up to a central person in the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division, who then combines the information; is talking with OPM; puts together a memorandum setting out the facts for each site, and recommending how many observers are needed.

So it's a very intensive, a very detailed law enforcement investigation. That's how it usually works in Southern areas. Where the concern is with language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act, it's a little bit different. There still is an investigation, but because the problems involved with violations of the Language Minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act usually are systemic and do not depend on any particular election contest in a city, county, or school district—

Mr. CHABOT. Do you do that before each election?

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. Thank you.

Mr. WEINBERG. In the specially covered areas.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay.

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. You can continue.

Mr. WEINBERG. Because of the language violations of the Language Minority provisions usually are more systemic, an initial investigation is what's needed. Usually, these days, there's litigation that results and a court certifies the county. So you have everything you would have leading up to litigation, which is a lot of work and a very intensive effort.

After that, the first election, however, the observers could be assigned again and again without repeated investigations. It's the information really one gets out of the polling places for the language minority coverage that would recommend going or not going again to the next election.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. Thank you very much. My time has expired, but, Ms. Randa, is there anything that you want to—

Ms. RANDA. I would just confirm what Mr. Weinberg said that our involvement is to coordinate on the number sent to each polling site.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. Thank you very much. My time has expired.

The Ranking Member of the overall Committee, Mr. Conyers, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you, Chairman Chabot.

Three considerations. I start with Mr. Weinberg. There's been only one certification by the Attorney General to section 6, Titus County, Texas. Does that mean a lot are coming through the courts under section 3 or does it mean there need to be a lot more?

My second consideration—and I'll go over these again—is this linkage between certification of observers and its validity.

And then finally, I had one of the witnesses tell me that Federal observers are kept out of the polls by State law, so it's frequently hard for them to see anything that's happening. It's hard to be an observer if you can't get into the polls under State law.

Can you help put some of these things into context?

Mr. WEINBERG. I can help with some of them I think.

Taking the last one first, State law would keep most people out of the polling places, but Federal observers get to in the polling places because the Voting Rights Act lets them. It's the authorization of the Voting Rights Act that lets Federal observers in. Otherwise, the Federal observers are like people off the street, and just can't walk into a polling place on Election Day.

As far as the certifications go, as I haven't been involved in that, I don't know. I went onto the Justice Department website a couple days ago to see if I could tell what's been going on in the last few years, and there have been a lot of court certifications it looks like as a result of litigation under the Language Minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act. And observers are being assigned to watch elections in those areas.

I don't know why there have been few, if any, certifications by the Attorney General of counties.

Mr. CONYERS. Well, from everything I've been hearing, you know we've got piles of complaints that come in. Unless all of them are invalid, I mean this doesn't add up, Mr. Weinberg.

Let me put it like this: Are attorneys who are Federal observers precluded from coming into the voting booths?

Mr. WEINBERG. The Justice Department attorneys in most States would be precluded from going into the polling places because they're neither registered voters there nor polling place officials.

The Federal observers, however, can go into polling place where they're assigned—any county jurisdiction that's been certified.

Mr. CONYERS. Ms. Pew, do you or Ms. Randa, want to add anything to this discussion.

Ms. PEW. I will add that in Arizona, observers, with prior approval, are welcome into our polling places. We ask that they submit something in writing to me by the Friday prior to the election, so that I can send that to the poll workers.

Given that a lot of them are non-Native American, and then poses a threat. We did have an incident in 2000 that prompted quite a chaotic sense in about 17 of our precincts, and, for that reason, we began a political protocol that is mandatory for our observers.

Mr. CONYERS. Could you get a little outdated considering the way the process is working now?

Ms. PEW. I can't respond to that, because in our county the Recorder's Office and the Elections Office are separate. The Recorder's Office maintains the voter rolls, as far as purging those, as Mr. Weinberg has spoken to, so I can't respond to that.

Mr. CHABOT. Ms. Randa?

Ms. RANDA. I wouldn't want to hazard a conclusion about whether it should or how it should change, but I will confirm what Mr. Weinberg said about there having been very little activity other than removing names from the list of registered voters. So that part of the role is what has evolved.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you, all. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. The gentleman's time has expired.

The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Scott, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Weinberg, let me ask you a little more specifically, just from a practical point of view, if a local civic organization suspects problems in a certain area, how do they get an observer into that area now, and how would you propose changing that mechanism?

Mr. WEINBERG. Getting in touch with the Justice Department about the need for Federal observers is the easiest thing on earth. All you need to do is call. A telephone call will do it.

In fact, the Justice Department attorneys rely very, very greatly on information and input from people who are in the counties, whether they are victims or witnesses or just concerned citizens.

We always were open to those kinds of contacts. If somebody has a particular problem in any county, we always encouraged to call us, let us know what the concern is, and we will investigate.

If the investigation reveals facts that show violations of the Voting Rights Act and need for observers, the observers will be sent.

Now, in Virginia, there are no certified counties, so that whole certification process we were talking about before, where there has to be an investigation, and then a recommendation to the Attorney General to sign a piece of—he actually signs a piece of paper that says I hereby certify, and then that's published in the Federal Register before Federal observers can be assigned.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. And that's the process now?

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. And are you proposing any change to that process?

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes. I'm proposing that in my imagined the new process there would be an investigation and the Assistant Attorney General would agree to a recommendation and then sign a piece of paper that says that Federal observers would be needed to watch proceedings in the polling place in order to enforce the Voting Rights Act.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Now, how long does that certification stay active?

Mr. WEINBERG. Now, it stays active forever. A jurisdiction can petition under section 13 of the Voting Rights Act to stop the Federal examiner appointment. I don't think anybody ever has.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Do the observers have any specific qualifications?

Mr. WEINBERG. Observers, by and large, OPM, as I understand it tries to have observers be OPM personnel where that's possible; in some instances, where language minority voters are concerned, there may not be sufficient numbers of OPM personnel who speak that language, especially in Indian country. And so people from other agencies are taken in.

But the Federal observers are personnel who are trained. There are periodic trainings through the year, and then there are on-site trainings that are specific and briefings of the observer before the election.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. If you didn't have the observers, how would you investigate complaints?

Mr. WEINBERG. When I started in the Justice Department, I was law clerk in the summer of 1965. The Voting Rights Act passed in early August, but we still had many lawsuits that were pending. They were terribly cumbersome. They're very difficult to investigate. The records alone are very difficult to get, and I think the Court, in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, which found the Voting Rights Act special provisions constitutional, recognized how difficult it is to mount a standard garden variety lawsuit against violations of the Voting Rights Act.

So, absent the Federal observers, it would be terribly, terribly difficult.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. The gentleman's time has expired.

I'd ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given one additional minute, if he would yield to me for a moment?

Would the gentleman from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Yes.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. I just wanted to follow up with one question, Mr. Weinberg. What criteria would you envision for certification of observers?

Mr. WEINBERG. I think the criteria would be that there is evidence of probable violations of the Voting Rights Act. I mean I don't know that one needs much more.

The certification procedure now is just about that. It's—for examiners. It's not a detailed certification.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay.

Mr. WEINBERG. And I would think it shouldn't—certainly not be more detailed and possibly a little less. But it would be keyed to possible violations of the Voting Rights Act.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Well, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. I yield back.

Mr. SCOTT OF VIRGINIA. Reclaiming my time, when do they certify it now?

Mr. WEINBERG. They certify—now the certification is it's necessary to enforce the 14th and 15th amendments.

Mr. CHABOT. If the gentleman would yield? Isn't it also or 20 written complaints?

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes. There's an alternative that if you get 20 written complaints. That, however, triggers the Attorney General's consideration. And so it all devolves pretty much to the same point, which is we in the Justice Department had to figure out that there were violations of the law that were probable and usually were happening and persuade the Attorney General of that.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you. The gentleman's time has expired.

The gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Watt, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WATT. Mr. Chairman, let me defer to Mr. Scott, if I can. I'm trying to see whether there are any things I need to question about.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. All right. We'll just start from scratch here then, and yield to the gentleman from Georgia. Mr. Scott is recognized for 5 minutes, and then we'll come back to Mr. Watt.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Weinberg, I wanted just start for a moment with your suggestion that we move away from the Federal examiners, because I—given your history, you were there at the beginning. You understand the whole make up and need for both examiners and observers. I'm not quite convinced, just from my own preliminary investigation of this that we may need to do away with examiners.

And your reason for saying we may need to modify or do away with the examiners was that the link doesn't exist. And I think your meaning of the link that I got was your quote was that there were no more hostile elected officials.

Can you elaborate on that, because there is still, in my estimation, hostile elected officials in various pockets of the South, and, a matter of fact, all across this nation. And if that is the link that you think doesn't exist, I am here to assure you that it does still exist.

I'm always of the opinion that we move with and err on the side of caution. In Georgia, for example, there are still 300,000 eligible African-Americans that are unregistered to vote, and time after time and case after case, we have documented hostility. Crosses are still being burned. In some of these areas, voters are being intimidated.

So I'm very concerned about doing away with that, and especially in view of the fact that the Federal examiners are used as the trigger to determine whether or not to send these observers in. So how do we replace that trigger? But would you mind elaborating on that linkage?

Mr. WEINBERG. Sure. I'd be happy to.

I agree with you a hundred percent that there are hostile polling place officials throughout the country, and that's one of the reasons that I think the Federal Observer provision is so important.

The link I was talking about is it was a specific link to newly federally registered voters, as it existed between 1965 and 1972 in the South. As the Voting Rights Act was constructed, the observers were to watch specifically to see if those particular voters were being hostilely treated in the polls. And the complaint structure of the Federal examiners was as to complaints as to the mistreatment of those newly enfranchised voters.

The passage of time has taken care of many of those situations. Certainly, some of those same areas are areas where Federal observers still would be assigned.

But it's not because those African-American voters have just been put on the roles by a Federal examiner. The problem is both broader and deeper than that. And I think Federal observers are necessary for that.

The Federal Examiner function for registering voters, however, has been—it hasn't been used in 30 years. There were a couple of isolated instances of Federal registration in 1982 and 1993, but apart from that, it hasn't been used since the 1970's, in some part because of the success of the Voting Rights Act, but also because of the enactment of new laws that make voter registration a lot easier—the restrictive hours and locations that people were faced with in the '60's. Now, you can register by mail.

So there are improvements in the voter registration process, and it is the voter registration process and the maintenance of the names of those people who were listed in 1965 to 1972 that the examiner provisions of the Voting Rights Act are geared to.

So it has nothing to do with the need for Federal observers to get information on violations in the polling places—discrimination against racial or language group members. That's going on nationwide, and I think the observers are necessary for that.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. Mr. Weinberg, why are then—why was the Federal Examiner certification a prerequisite for bringing in the observers in the first place?

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired, but you can answer the question.

Mr. WEINBERG. All right. The Voting Rights Act after the Selma to Montgomery March brought everything to a head in early 1965. The big focus was on getting people registered to vote. It was—we were talking total disenfranchisement. And so we needed to allow people to get on the voting rolls, and the way that the Voting Rights Act is constructed, if you read the sections 6 and 7, you'll see a very, very intricate pattern of getting people to—into the examiners, to list them, to turn the lists over, and this was a big deal because you were taking a Federal employee, a Federal examiner, and inserting that Federal examiner into what is a State and local process, which is voter registration. The principles of federalism were very, very strong, and this was an extraordinary remedy, the first time ever in this country, that you had these Federal officials coming in and just taking over, just taking over and without a court order. It was just an administrative decision. In order to make that administrative decision have the import that it needed to insert those Federal people into the State function, the Voting Rights Act drafters had the Attorney General personally sign a certification that this was necessary to enforce the 14th amendment and 15th amendment.

And that's how this came to be. The reason they're linked is because the drafters then thought, well, we have all these newly enfranchised voters coming into these terribly hostile polling places, we can't just let them wander in there. But what are we going to do? They say, well, we'll have authorized Federal observers to watch what happens and get the information back to the Attorney General so the Justice Department could take action if it was needed.

Mr. SCOTT OF GEORGIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Watt, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WATT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. Randa, when observers are sent out—have been sent out in the past, has there a history of anybody complaining about the observers. And, if so, what do those complaints normally consist of and who normally makes them?

Ms. RANDA. Any incidents or issues that come up during a given exercise or observation would be put in the report and it is then passed to Department of Justice, who maintains that and decides whether to take any action on it.

We don't actually maintain that information, historically, so I couldn't speak to the record on that. I know anecdotally, years ago, there were sometimes issues getting access and getting friendly treatment. But I don't believe that's been a problem in recent years.

Mr. WATT. Mr. Weinberg, to some extent, what you are proposing is constructing a new model for sending out observers, which I think probably is a reasonably good idea. The prior model applied that the observers to cover jurisdictions, select jurisdictions for sending observers to; isn't that right?

Mr. WEINBERG. Right. The observers in all the specially covered jurisdictions.

Mr. WATT. Is there—in the construction of the new model that you are proposing, if you were constructing a new model that didn't apply only to covered jurisdictions—it applied in some triggering fashion that triggered based on complaints or suspicions, how would you articulate what the standard would be? You said at one point I think in your testimony that you thought maybe the observer provisions ought to be applied nationally. But how would you articulate the standards that you would use to trigger it?

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes. My idea would be to keep the Federal observers tied to the Voting Rights Act enforcement. And you would need a finding by the Justice Department that the provisions of the Voting Rights Act are being violated or actions are happening which would constitute violations of the Voting Rights Act. You need that finding before—

Mr. WATT. Are being violated or—I mean it's too late after they've been violated. The election is taking place. So you'd—I mean you'd have to be looking at some imminent danger.

We presumed under the old framework that there was imminent danger because there was a history, and we know that there is some imminent danger going forward, because people are engaging in this—or appear to be engaging in some conduct. But I'm just trying to figure out how you would articulate what the standard would be for the Justice Department to trigger the observer provisions?

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes. The law now talks about circumstances that appear to be reasonably attributed to violations of the 14th and 15th amendments.

All along, before a certification can be made and even now, before Federal observers are assigned, the Justice Department makes a determination that racial and language minority group members are facing circumstances in the polling place that would violate the Voting Rights Act. We get that information by conducting investigations, conducting interviews in the normal way one would investigate a possible violation of a Federal law.

When you reach that conclusion, you don't have to have proof by a preponderance of the evidence in a structured way that the violations have occurred. What you need is information that indicates that those violations are occurring, and that's basically what happens.

Mr. WATT. So it would be some kind of good faith determination by the Justice Department that a violation of the 14th or 15th amendment has or is about to occur?

Mr. WEINBERG. Right.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's—

Mr. WATT. May I ask unanimous consent for one additional minute—

Mr. CHABOT. Without objection, so ordered.

Mr. WATT. —just to ask one additional question of Mr. Weinberg.

The reports of the observers—you testified you don't think they ought to be made public, published, unlike when we're observing elections in other countries.

What's done with those reports now?

Mr. WEINBERG. Those reports are used by the Justice Department attorneys to determine whether more legal action is needed, if there's already a lawsuit pending or if there's no lawsuit, whether a legal action is needed. And I should say also that these reports are not always kept from public view. They're—the redacted versions have been released under the Freedom of Information Act. I mean there are ways to see them. Often, they're not all that illuminating since they're—

Mr. WATT. But wouldn't it serve some deterrent effect for—to future voting rights violations to publish the reports of the observers?

Mr. WEINBERG. Yes. I think the deterrent effect is in the legal action by the Justice Department, and I think that's been shown to be very effective.

And since these reports often are also used if a court has certified a county, the report goes to the court. And the reports are used in those instances to determine liability of the defendant or the county and whether the relief has been adequate. So they are in that sense used right away, and I think the deterrent effect is really adequate the way it exists now.

Mr. CHABOT. The gentleman's time has expired.

The Chair, in light of the fact that this is the ninth hearing in this—on the Voting Rights Act and we have more to come at some future point has been avoiding second rounds. However, the Chair would like to ask one question. And it's my understanding the Ranking Member has an additional question as well, so I would recognize myself for a minute.

And if I could, Ms. Pew, ask you a question, and this is again establishing—one of our principal goals here is to establish a record in light of the fact that this may well be before the Supreme Court some day.

Let me ask you what types of discrimination do minorities sometimes continue to experience in polling places that you're aware of?

Ms. PEW. Well, it's my experience that given the outline and the guideline that was given to us in the consent decree that we've complied with and continue to, even though it is now outdated and we're not made to do that, we continue to do that, and we're not seeing discrimination. We are—we've got a robust program that is reaching out and based on the numbers of the voters that are increasing, we're not seeing the discrimination.

Mr. CHABOT. Yeah. What were the discriminations based upon in the consent decree that you—

Ms. PEW. They were based on denial. They weren't able to read the ballot. They weren't able to understand the ballot. Things were posted in the newspapers by statute, but they couldn't understand them, and that's definitely a disadvantage to someone who is not only maybe language non-speaking, but very language limited as far as even in their cultural, their native language. They don't read Navajo a lot of them.

And so it is a verbal language. It is important that all of these things be looked at. And I believe that given the outline we have in the consent decree and the things that we're still following that it needs to continue.

Mr. CHABOT. Okay. All right. Thank you very much.

The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. CONYERS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Weinberg, you've noted that there haven't been any complaints regarding federally listed voters over the last 20 years. But do we need new tools to deal with the sometimes large-scale purges of eligible voters from the voting rolls? How do we keep voters on the voter rolls if we eliminate examiners and observers—as I understand are only at the polls on election day.

Mr. WEINBERG. The Federal Observer provisions don't address all of the violations that could occur with regard to voter registration and voting. It's really—it really has to do with what happens inside the polling places on election day. But the law certainly is adequate as it stands to deal with other discriminatory actions and that would include discriminatory purges of the rolls.

Mr. CONYERS. Who would do it?

Mr. WEINBERG. The Justice Department could do it.

Mr. CONYERS. But they wouldn't have to be observers?

Mr. WEINBERG. No. No.

Mr. CONYERS. They would be what kind of personnel?

Mr. WEINBERG. It would be investigations in the normal course of business at the Justice Department, investigations by attorneys, by the FBI. That's how it works.

Mr. CONYERS. Okay. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much, Mr. Conyers.

That concludes this hearing, and I want to thank the witnesses again for their testimony. It has been very, very helpful.

If there's no further business to come before this Committee, we're adjourned. Thank you.

[Whereupon, at 2:03 p.m., the Subcommittee was adjourned.]

MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE HEARING RECORD

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JOHN CONYERS, JR. A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MICHIGAN AND MEMBER, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Despite the optimistic tone struck by our witnesses and members of this Committee, racial and language minorities still face serious obstacles to equal participation in the electoral process. During every election cycle, my staff fields numerous complaints involving election day mischief from around the country. While many simply involve hardball campaign tactics, a troubling number cross the line into questionable race politics that raises the issue of systematic suppression of the minority vote.

During the 2002 election, I referred a complaint to the Department of Justice concerning fliers circulated in African-American areas of Baltimore, Maryland, that were intended to confuse and suppress voter turnout in those communities. The flier misstated the date of election day and implied that payment of overdue parking tickets, moving violations and rents were qualifications for voting. Similarly, During the 2003 Kentucky gubernatorial election, I referred a complaint to the Department concerning reports that 59 precincts with significant African-American populations had been targeted for vote challenges by local campaign officials.

These kind of tactics have been the target of injunctive relief by the Department under provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1957. For example, in 1990, the Department sued over a so-called "ballot security" program in North Carolina, where post-cards were mailed to African-American voters that were designed to discourage them from coming to the polls by providing misinformation about the requirements for voters. As a remedy to these allegations of voter intimidation, the parties entered into a consent decree, but the damage was done, with the major African-American candidate losing a close election.^{/1/}

The failure of the 1957 Act to bring prospective relief for interference with the right to vote was the main reason behind the enactment of Sections 3, 6 & 8 for the Voting Rights Act of 1965. These provisions give the federal courts and the Attorney General the authority to monitor the procedures in polling places and at sites where ballots are counted to enforce the voting guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendments. Unlike, mere attorney coverage or election monitoring by the advocacy community, these provisions give federal monitors the legal authority to enter all polling places, and even the voting booths themselves, to provide the closest scrutiny of the elections process.

To date, a total of 148 counties and parishes in 9 states have been certified by the Attorney General for election monitoring pursuant to Section 6.^{/2/} In addition, 19 political subdivisions in 12 states are currently certified for election monitoring by federal court order, pursuant to Section 3.^{/3/}

On election day last week, the Department sent federal observers and Justice Department personnel to 16 jurisdictions in seven states to monitor elections, including Hamtramck, Michigan, a jurisdiction partly within my district which had an ugly episode of discrimination against Arab-Americans at the polls in 1999. In 2004, the

^{/1/}Consent Decree in United States of America v. North Carolina Republican Party, No. 91-161-CIV-5-F (Feb. 27, 1992).

^{/2/}Alabama (22 counties), Arizona (3), Georgia (29), Louisiana (12), Mississippi (50), New York (3), North Carolina (1), South Carolina (11) and Texas (17).

^{/3/}California (6), Illinois (1), Louisiana (1), Massachusetts (1), Michigan (1), New Jersey (1), New Mexico (2), New York (3), Pennsylvania (1), South Dakota (1), Texas (1), and Washington (1).

Department coordinated and sent 1,463 federal observers and 533 Department personnel to monitor 163 elections in 105 jurisdictions in 29 states.

I believe that the monitoring of elections by federal observers is an important aspect of the Voting Rights Act that should be reauthorized. As prior witness testimony has clearly shown, discrimination at the polls remains a problem. Where jurisdictions have a record of discrimination or current threats exist to ballot access, minority voters should not have to wait for federal assistance to come after the fact.

Monitors play the important role of addressing concerns about racial discrimination and ensuring compliance, so that voters can rely on a fair process now, rather than waiting for litigation later.

Given the fact that the Department has trumpeted its "voter protection" programs, I am disappointed that they did not appear today at today's hearing. In numerous press releases, the Department has appeared to express a strong commitment to the monitoring program, especially in the area of Section 203's bilingual election requirements. There are questions, however, about the rising emphasis on attorney coverage, the limited number of certifications under Section 6, and whether there has been a shift in enforcement priorities. While Mr. Weinberg can act as an able proxy for the Department in most areas, only the Department can definitively respond to these questions.

Before closing, I must commend the work of the Office of Personnel Management, whose efforts at recruiting, training, and supervising election monitors is the key to the program's success. Ms. Randa, I look forward to your testimony and hope that you address ways of improving the long-term viability of the monitoring program.

Summary:

E. Mark Braden concentrates his work principally on election law and governmental affairs. This field includes work with Congress, the Federal Election Commission, state campaign finance agencies, public integrity issues, political broadcast regulation, contests, recounts, the Voting Rights Act, initiatives, referendums and redistricting. Each is an area in which he has substantial knowledge and unusual experience.

Mr. Braden spent ten years as Chief Counsel to the Republican National Committee prior to joining Baker & Hostetler. He has worked intimately with many elected officials, the major national political consultants and pollsters providing successful, and often highly innovative, legal guidance. For example, in campaign finance, he can rightly claim to be the father of "soft money" as now used in national political campaigns. In redistricting, he has argued successfully at the U.S. Supreme Court and has been involved in litigation across the nation. In addition to his experience in the area of federal election law, Mr. Braden is widely recognized as an authority on state election laws, having served as Chief Counsel to the Ohio Elections Commission and Election Counsel for the Secretary of State in Ohio. He has been a principal lawyer in many of the largest recounts in our political history.

Mr. Braden was a key negotiator for the site city agreements and many of the other contracts for four Republican National Conventions and has been special counsel to the House Administration Committee. He has also worked with many nonprofit organizations on government affairs issues.

Mr. Braden has testified before congressional committees and the Federal Election Commission on numerous occasions. His experience in these areas has been recognized by numerous invitations to be a guest lecturer at universities and institutes across the nation.

Mr. Braden is a member of the adjunct faculty of George Washington University and a former Captain of the United States Army Reserve.

2 MS. SIMS: We're still missing one.
3 Our chairman and vice-chairman will be coming by 4 and participating for part of the program.
5 Right now, they are trying to finish up their
6 own meeting, a little discussion.

7 My name is Peggy Sims. I have been
8 with the EAC since April, 2004. Prior to that 9 time, I worked for 18 years with the FEC
10 national clearinghouse in election
11 administration, and I am the contracting officer
12 on this project, so that's how I got involved.

13 I would like to just quickly -- this
14 is really our consultants' meeting, but before

15 we get into that, I just wanted to review,
16 review our authority in this area. Obviously,
17 we have no enforcement authority when it comes 18 to voting fraud, but under HAVA, we're charged 19 with developing national statistics on voter
20 fraud, and methods of deterring and 21 investigating vote fraud, which we obviously 22 have to do in consultation with the folks who

1 actually do the enforcement.

2 we also are charged with developing
3 ways of identifying, deterring, and
4 investigating methods of voter intimidation, as 5 many of us feel is really a subset of voting
6 fraud, but it may be something when we get to 7 the definition phrase, we may want to talk a
8 little bit more about what we mean by 9 intimidation because it seems to mean different
10 things to different people.

11 The focus of this project was to do
12 some preliminary research just to get us
13 started. We selected a bipartisan team of 14 consultants to develop a comprehensive drafted
15 description of what constitutes voting fraud and 16 voter intimidation, and to perform some 17 background research, which they will review, to 18 establish a project working group, convene the 19 working group, and basically we're looking for 20 your ideas as we go along.

21 Once the working group is completed,
22 we're going to keep a transcript of this

1 session. We will also keep lots of notes. They
2 are going to take your recommendations and fold
3 those into a final report that goes to our 4 Commissioners. Ultimately, that report, if we 5 have any clarifications or corrections, we will
6 deal with our consultants first, and then it
7 will go to our Standards Board and Board of 8 Advisors for review and comment as well. That's 9 something that we're required to do with all of 10 our research under HAVA.

11 The purpose of the working group is 12 to collect experts in this area. We have 13 election officials, state and local, we have 14 applicants, and some serve more than one
15 function. And given the preliminary research,
16 and your expertise and EAC authority under HAVA,
17 we would like you to provide ideas as to where 18 is EAC supposed to go from here, and what should 19 we follow up with additional research, other 20 additional efforts that we can mount, given our 21 authority in this area.

22 We aren't here to debate what other

1 agencies are supposed to do, or what
2 organizations should or should not be doing.
3 We're focusing on what EAC can do. And one of 4 the things EAC can do is offer help to other
5 election officials, states, and other agencies
6 perhaps, but we don't have any enforcement
7 authority and we don't have any authority to

Transcript 051806

8 tell other agencies what to do.

9 Okay. What I'd like to do is just 10 start going around the table and have everybody
11 say a little bit about themselves. Most of you
12 know each other, but I also want to have the 13 ladies back here introduce themselves as well.
14 May I start here?

15 MR. SEREBROV: I don't exist.

16 MS. SIMS: You don't exist?

17 MR. SEREBROV: I'm just here for fun.

18 MS. SIMS: Then we'll have them pick
19 it up from here.

20 MR. SEREBROV: I am Job Serebrov from 21 Arkansas. I have practiced election law for 22 approximately 15 years, both in Arkansas and

1 other southern states, and internationally.
2 I helped review and draft changes to the 3 election code in Libya. I served as an Election
4 Commissioner in Arkansas for six years. I have
5 drafted some election statutes in Arkansas
6 itself, and I was general counsel for the 7 election ballot fraud committee for the 8 Republican Party in Arkansas, appointed by 9 Hutchinson. I had an Arkansas organization
10 called Our Kansas For Fair Elections, which 11 operated for about seven years.

12 How much more do you want?

13 MS. SIMS: If you're comfortable with 14 that, that's fine.

15 MR. SEREBROV: Any other questions

16 can be referred to my secretary -- no.

17 MS. WANG: I am Tova Wang. I am a
18 fellow with the Century Foundation, which is a
19 nonpartisan think tank, based both in New York
20 and here in D.C.. I have been involved in 21 politics since adulthood, but I have been 22 working on these issues since the 2000 election.

1 I have been working on the issues since then and
2 a career was born. With the problems we
3 continue to have, the career will be maintained.
4 I am also a lawyer by training.

5 MR. ROKITA: I am Todd Rokita,
6 Secretary of State of the State of Indiana. I
7 also do a lot of election administration,
8 election reform, and I think I can represent all
9 of the secretaries of states in the nation with 10 this sentence; it has become more and more our 11 career as well, although this secretary will 12 tell you that I don't want it to be.

13 I look for these reforms to be 14 finite, to a certain extent in length, to be 15 read as problem solved. I have other divisions
16 in my office that I would like to put some more
17 attention to, quite honestly, but we definitely 18 see the need for these reforms, at least some of 19 them.

20 MR. BAUER: My name is Bob Bauer, one
21 the partners of a law firm. I have been 22 practicing election law since 1977, and I have

1 experience, largely through political parties,
2 with this issue but also in other ways through
3 other conferences or professional discoveries
4 related to my area of practice.

5 MS. SIMS: Thank you.

6 MR. GREENBAUM: I am Jon Greenbaum,
7 Director of the Voting Rights Project. I am
8 actually here for my executive director. After 9 the 2000 election and problems that occurred,
10 the civil rights community saw the need for a
11 nonpartisan organization or coalition of groups
12 to deal with the problems that were apparent
13 from that election, and so Election Protection
14 was formed. The lawyers committee has
15 essentially been the legal lead of the Election
16 Protection Coalition since it's inception. In 17 2004, we had roughly 8,000 legal volunteers who 18 staffed a hot line that received 110,000 calls
19 on Election Day and 200,000 calls during the 20 election process that had attorneys out in the 21 field, legal volunteers out at the field, at the 22 polls, at legal coordinating committees, and as 10

1 mobile field units.

2 we plan on, in sort of going forward
3 since the 2004 election, we work on both
4 election protection and electoral reform issues.
5 We see those as kind of being interconnected.
6 And as one, we created something within my
7 project called the National Campaign for Fair

8 Elections, which is specifically designed to 9 work on those issues. And I want to thank the 10 EAC for inviting us to take part in this. Oh,
11 and prior to that, I worked at the Department of 12 Justice in the civil rights division in the 13 voting section with Barry, during my time there
14 for seven years, and I enforced basically all
15 the voting rights laws, all the federal voting
16 rights laws there.

17 MR. GINSBERG: I am Ben Ginsberg. I
18 a partner at Patton, Boggs, here in Washington.
19 I have been practicing election law since 1982.

20 MS. ROGERS: My name is Kathy Rogers.
21 I am Director of Elections for the State of 22 Georgia. I am one of the people who did not

1 intend to grow up being an election official. I
2 started my career almost three decades ago as a
3 poll worker many, many years ago, and I am very
4 pleased now to be able to, in the position I am
5 in right now, appreciate the opportunity to work
6 on this groups.

7 Those of us who are election
8 officials often enjoy reading things that 9 analysts and esteemed attorneys have put 10 together. And frequently we're the ones who are 11 trying to implement the election while taking 12 everything into account. So I think this group
13 has a great focus.

14 MR. WEINBERG: My name is Barry
15 Weinberg. I was the acting chief and deputy

16 chief of the civil rights division voting
17 section of the U. S. Department of Justice,
18 there for 25 years. I supervised the Justice
19 Department and the Federal Reserve Program, as 20 well as all kind of law enforcement, including 21 national voter registration. I retired in 22 January, 2000. Since then, I have kept some 12

1 contact going. My wife and I have an article in 2 the Temple Law Review called, Problems in 3 America's Polling Places, how They Can Be
4 Stopped," and doing some work internationally,
5 election monitoring, lecturing, seminars,
6 traveling. Before that, we were in Liberia
7 doing seminars on election dispute resolution,
8 and that has formed the basis for a book I have 9 written coming out next month called,
10 "Resolution of Election Disputes." That will be 11 the principles that can be used in election
12 challenges.

13 MR. PEREZ: I am J.R. Perez,
14 Elections Administration for a county in 15 Guadelupe, Texas. Let me give you a little 16 information about an election administrator. I
17 am neutral because the position is hired by 18 three out of five commissioners, and fired four 19 out of five. I have got a lot of autonomy and 20 it makes it easy for me to be independent and 21 implement policy that is not necessarily 22 political and going with the current flow, but

Transcript 051806

1 it has allowed me a lot of durability in the
2 trenches. I have been doing it for about four 3 years in the front line. If anybody has been 4 around election like you all have, you know on 5 the front line there's casualties coming and 6 going on a regular basis.

7 I am hoping that I can bring any type
8 of insight to you, in terms of how we handle
9 those incidences of those telephone calls, and 10 how we can hopefully explain the difference 11 between the theoretical concept of election and 12 the actual practicality of election, because 13 there is a great distinction in a lot of 14 people's minds. They don't necessarily 15 understand what we're trying to accomplish, and 16 they have a lot of confusion in terms of how 17 we're doing it, why we're doing it, why it's not 18 living up to the mythical dream that a lot of 19 people put it into.

20 MR. CORTES: Edgardo Cortes. I am an
21 election research specialist here at the EAC. I
22 have been here since July of last year. Prior

14

1 to that, I did some campaign work and also ran a
2 national voter registration campaign focused on 3 the Latino community.

4 MR. DONSANTO: I am Craig Donsanto,
5 with the election branch of the U. S. Department
6 of Justice. I have been practicing election law
7 since 1972. I am responsible for overseeing all 8 investigations and prosecutions brought in the

Transcript 051806

9 United States at the federal level involving 10 voting and the financing of political campaign.
11 I have a member of the EAC's Board of Advisors,
12 and I have also, as Barry alluded to, done quite 13 a bit of work internationally, both with him and 14 occasionally without him, helping emerging
15 democracies write election laws.

16 MS. SIMS: Thank you.

17 I just want to introduce the woman behind me
18 because they really helped us pull this meeting
19 together. Without their support, we wouldn't be 20 where we are right now.

21 We have got Elle Culver, who is a
22 special assistant to Commissioner Davidson. We 15

1 have got Devon Rome, missing who is an intern
2 working on her masters degree in social science,
3 sociology. Thank you.

4 Laiza, I forget where you are.

5 LAIZA: Soon to begin the masters in
6 political science, which I work in the research
7 department, and I'm going to get to know some of 8 the election officials because I will be 9 conducting a 2006 election survey. So you will 10 get to see plenty of e-mails from myself.

11 MR. ROKITA: Surveys, love them.

12 MS. SIMS: I would like you to tell
13 me, I notice you have served as a legal intern.
14 Tell us where you are in that process.

15 TAMAR: I just finished my second 16 year of law school at George Mason, and I have

Transcript 051806

17 been at the EAC for a year.

18 MS. SIMS: Now, I know on our agenda
19 it mentions we would talk about other EAC
20 projects but it dawned on me that might be more 21 appropriate later on, just before we get to 22 ideas for future EAC action, because then I can

1 review things that we're already doing. So we
2 won't spend a lot of time and go on to what we
3 still need to do.

4 MS. WANG: I'm going to try and
5 briefly over go over the work we have already
6 done. You got sent tons of material, and I'm 7 not sure if anybody looked at it, but hopefully,
8 you looked at at least the paper summaries of 9 things.

10 The first thing I really want to 11 emphasize about the work that we did, although 12 we split up some of the work, everything that we 13 produced was signed off on by the other person.
14 Everything that you're seeing here is a product
15 in that sense. We agreed on the steps that we 16 would take to produce these materials.

17 And the second point you should bear
18 in mind is, Job and I pretty much worked on this
19 entirely alone, without any support staff. So 20 if you see typos on things, I apologize for 21 that.

22 Generally, the time period that we

17

1 covered in the research we were doing was
2 January 1 of 2001 to January 1 of 2006, all
3 those, Job's cases, went before that a little
4 bit, the reason being, it would be too unwieldly
5 to try and sort through all the materials that 6 came out of the 2000 election because there is 7 just so much, and there's been so much since
8 then that it seems sort of a natural place to 9 begin. And also the Help America Vote Act had 10 been passed subsequently, so it seems like maybe
11 improvements had been made and we should take it
12 from there.

13 The first thing I think on the 14 agenda, that we should talk about the literature
15 and the reports that we went over. We tried to 16 do a review of all the existing research we 17 could find on this topic. I think you have a 18 list of all the pieces that we looked at. On 19 the CD is the summaries we looked at. We looked 20 at a range of things; Government documents,
21 academic studies, reports from advocacy groups.

22 As to how we chose the pieces that we 18

1 reviewed, to some extent, I already had a lot of
2 them and knew about a lot of them because I had
3 been working on this for a while. Other people
4 suggested them and we did searches for anything
5 that we might have missed after that.

6 So just to maybe go over some of the 7 highlights, I don't want to go into the details
8 of the existing literature too much because they

9 are really sort of all over the place. There
10 are a couple things that I will say about them
11 generally that I talk about in the summary,
12 which is, that they are mostly anecdotal. This 13 is no surprise to any of us sitting here. There
14 is really little research that is scientific or 15 systematic, which is part of the reason this 16 project was undertaken. I saw McDonald work as 17 the most systematic, but those probably don't go
18 far enough. And I talked to a number of 19 researchers about this, and I think one thing --
20 and I will get more into this when we talk about 21 the methodologies that I suggested -- this is a
22 very difficult undertaking, I think we all

19

1 realize this. To do it right in any kind of
2 scientific way would require tremendous
3 researches, mother than any academic or advocacy
4 group, that is. It is my personal believe, and 5 I have been told, there probably will be a
6 second phase to this that will maybe commit the 7 resources that are necessary to do it right.

8 The one other thing that I will say
9 about the existing research that we looked at is 10 that I think, by the nature of them, there is 11 very little follow-up. So you have books and 12 reports that make a number of allegations of 13 things that happened in a particular election,
14 but then you don't have the benefit of then
15 hindsight, to see what actually ended up
16 happening in the case. So you have

17 investigations of acts of something happened,
18 but you don't know if that ended up being an 19 administrative error or it ended up being 20 someone just crying wolf. While literature is 21 helpful, it really only takes you so far.

22 Are there any questions about that or 20

1 anything you want to comment about the
2 literature review that we've done?

3 MR. ROKITA: What's our current
4 budget for this project, and why do we think
5 there is going to be a Phase 2?

6 MS. SIMS: Well, Phase 2 would be
7 subsequent to the fiscal year, after we have 8 gone through the final report, that would 9 include the recommendations for future action.

10 MR. ROKITA: So that would be a vote
11 from the standards board?

12 MS. SIMS: I would have to ask the 13 Commissioners that are actually handling the 14 details of that. I'm not sure it actually takes 15 a vote, but generally, it requires some comment
16 by the boards. The boards absolutely have to 17 have input on that.

18 MR. ROKITA: So if I understand, part
19 of our charge here is to give some direction for 20 this phase?

21 MS. SIMS: What we're looking for 22 from the working group is to brainstorm ideas

21

1 for possible future research. We may combine
Page 15

012394

Transcript 051806

2 them into one or we may have different stages,
3 depending on what ideas come up and what the 4 Commissioners think that we can do, and our
5 Boards of Advisors and our Standards Board.

6 MR. ROKITA: So we're supposed to 7 think of these ideas, unbridled by any fiscal 8 constraints?

9 MS. SIMS: Yes. We'll have to worry
10 about the fiscal aspect when we get to that 11 point.

12 MR. GINSBERG: And our commission is 13 all about research.

14 MS. SIMS: We can provide
15 information. A lot of that is done through 16 research. We do research and provide the 17 results of that research to state legislatures
18 and anybody else who is interested. Now, you
19 have to realize, I came from the FEC where we 20 were hidden away. The office, six of us, that 21 was the whole office. Now, we have much more
22 visibility. So it is easier to get the word

22

1 out, get information out, but a lot of times
2 that information is based on research. We do
3 have to have some kind of research before we can
4 pass the information along, in terms of best
5 practices. It could be things -- well, we may 6 want -- I am jumping ahead of myself, but when 7 we get to the ideas on subsequent research, we 8 can talk about some of the findings that these 9 folks came up with, just in this limited

Transcript 051806

10 preliminary research, and what we might be able 11 to do with that, or what we might be able to 12 build on that already exists, but yes, we're
13 focusing on research, and that research does end
14 up being distributed via our website or in 15 response to individual inquiries.

16 MS. WANG: Ultimately, it could 17 result in something like guidelines or 18 recommendations or best practices.

19 MS. SIMS: And that all goes up on 20 our website.

21 MR. SEREBROV: We all introduced
22 ourselves. You've got the floor.

1 MR. HEARNE: I am Thor Hearne. I am
2 an attorney. I have practiced in the election
3 law area for a number of years now. I have been
4 involved in a number of different litigations,
5 as well as efforts on that front, counsel to the 6 American Center For Voting Rights.

7 MS. WANG: The only thing of 8 substance we have gone over, I was just 9 reviewing the literature that we had reviewed
10 and summarized what you have in your own
11 materials. Also in your materials, you have a 12 list of the people that we interviewed, and on 13 the CD, you have summaries of the interviews
14 themselves. Most of these interviews were 15 extremely informative and very helpful,
16 insightful. We chose the interviewees by coming 17 up with the categories of types of people we

18 wanted to talk to, and filled those categories
19 with equal numbers from each of us.

20 MR. SEREBROV: Unfortunately, not all
21 the people we wanted to talk to talked to us.

22 MS. WANG: Right. But also due to 24

1 time and resource constraints, we came up with
2 an original list, ten miles long, people we
3 would love to talk to.

4 There were certain categories that we
5 had to eliminate. For example, we don't have 6 any local DAs, again which is something for 7 later on that I would definitely advocate that 8 the next phase do. The ultimate category the 9 people we were able to talk to included
10 academics, election officials, lawyers, and 11 judges.

12 There were a few people who didn't
13 want to talk to us, mostly judges.

14 MR. SEREBROV: Although one did.

15 MS. WANG: We got one judge. Again,
16 all the interviews were conducted by both of us.
17 We split up the drafting of the summaries, but 18 they were reviewed and approved by the other 19 person, so they represent our impressions of the 20 interviews, both of us.

21 Just to go over quickly some of the 22 highlights from those interviews that I have in 25

1 the summary that you have of the interviews, we

2 did find pretty much, overwhelmingly, that
3 absentee fraud is the biggest problem, and vote
4 fraud would come in behind that. There was
5 widespread polling place fraud. Dead voting,
6 impersonation voting, there were a couple people
7 who thought that was a problem. Most people did
8 not.

9 In terms of intimidation, the whole
10 issue of challengers pre election and election
11 day challengers, decidedly most often as the 12 current concern in terms of intimidation.
13 However, at some of the more what we think of as 14 classic examples were brought up with us,
15 particularly very starkly in Native American
16 communities.

17 There was also the usual poll worker
18 harassing people, people taking pictures of 19 voting, and that kind of thing. With all due 20 respect to the people from the Department of 21 Justice here, the people we interviewed told us
22 that for various reasons, the Department of 26

1 Justice is bringing fewer cases now and is
2 focusing much more on non-citizen voting, felon
3 voting, and double voting, while the civil 4 rights public integrity section is focusing on
5 individuals and isolated instances of fraud
6 issues. And I know you don't agree with that,
7 but that's what across the board, people from 8 all sides of this said to us. That's the 9 perception. As usual, the voting lists were a

10 major concern, although, hopefully, that is 11 being taken care of by the state registration
12 databases.

13 Among the common recommendations,
14 getting back to the point we were just talking
15 about, many of the people we interviewed
16 supported stronger criminal laws, increased
17 enforcement of existing laws. Advocates from 18 across the spectrum expressed frustration with 19 the failure of the Department of Justice to 20 pursue more complaints. Mr. Donsanto told us
21 they were bringing fewer Section 2 cases, but 22 fewer were warranted, a lot had been achieved

27

1 and it wasn't as much as problem. Mr. Donsanto
2 told us election fraud cases had not gone up
3 since 2002, but the number of cases the 4 department is investigating and pursuing has 5 gone up dramatically, and that since 2002, the 6 department has brought more cases against alien
7 voters, double voters, than ever before.

8 In terms of more recommendations, a
9 couple of people suggested some kind of new law
10 that would make it easier to criminally
11 prosecute people for intimidation, even when 12 there is not racial interments involved. People
13 were hopeful about the statewide voter
14 registration databases. People advocated for 15 expanded monitoring of the polls, hopefully, by 16 the department or maybe others.

17 There were a number of people who

18 suggested that the challenge laws needed to be 19 revised in some states. I was surprised to 20 learn, in some states, you can challenge a 21 person with little to no basis for doing so, and 22 really sort of bog up the estimation that way.

1 There ought to be some serious look at the
2 various challenge laws, and the ones that have
3 that kind of thing going on that shouldn't be
4 happening. People advocated for the deceptive
5 practices bill currently sponsored by Burrock
6 Obama. There was a surprising split whether 7 partisan administration of elections would be
8 helpful. Some people felt it was a good idea
9 and some people thought partisan people, without 10 the partisan tag. Some academics were 11 advocating for going back to for cause only 12 absentee voting, but that didn't seem
13 politically practical right now. Two people
14 advocated a national identification card.

15 Anything I can answer? The great 16 nexus undertaking adventure. Initially, Job and 17 I came up with enormous search terms that could 18 be used to try and do a nexus search that would 19 come up with every case of fraud and 20 intimidation that happened in the last five 21 years. We determined quickly that would be
22 impossible. We agreed I would do the nexus

29

1 search, trying to be a little more creative,
2 using different combinations of terms that would

Transcript 051806

3 hopefully yield the same kind of result. Job
4 approved all of the search terms as I went
5 along. As I collected them, and you have this 6 on your CD, I have them on Excel spread sheets
7 to try and break down the articles so they can
8 be analyzed for patterns.

9 Each fraud was broken down by where
10 it took place, the date, what the allegation
11 was, the news publication it came from, and 12 where there was a follow-up article, whether 13 there had been any subsequent resolution to the 14 allegations. I am currently working on further
15 refining those, and I don't have it to produce,
16 to try and break it down more carefully, analyze 17 it. I want to include sub categories. So, for 18 example, when you're talking about absentee, you
19 have it broken down whether it was forgery of 20 that person's name or something like that. I am 21 also trying to refine it so you can see from the 22 chart who made the allegation, whether there was 30

1 any type of investigation, criminal, civil
2 action taken, whether there ought to be
3 follow-up research to determine what happened in 4 the case. For drawn out, complicated cases, you
5 have a description of the case. South Dakota,
6 Wisconsin, and Washington State.

7 Just to go over the highlights again
8 of the articles, none of this has come as news
9 to you, there are a bunch of ways that absentee
10 ballot fraud is committed. This was one area in

11 news articles, there were a substantial number
12 of official investigations and actual charges
13 filed. In terms of voter registration files,
14 again, you won't be surprised by the variety of 15 ways in which people commit voter registration
16 fraud using fake names, names of dead people.
17 You also have voters being tricked by a
18 particular party under false pretenses and also 19 the description of voter registration forms,
20 depending on your party. There was only one
21 article of a non-citizen registering to vote.
22 And, in general, many of the instances did

31

1 include official investigations and charges
2 filed, but from what I found in the initial
3 search, few actual convictions.

4 On voter intimidation and
5 suppression, this is a very thick chart because
6 there were so many allegations during the 2004
7 election, particularly on the challenge issue.
8 Almost none of these cases of intimidation that
9 were claimed in these articles were investigated
10 criminally or prosecuted criminally. And like I
11 said, with respect to the existing literature
12 and the interviews, challenges, that was the 13 number one topic but there was also, again, the 14 classic examples of photographing people leaving
15 the home, police presence, that kind of thing.
16 And also it wouldn't surprise you to know most 17 of these articles came out of battleground
18 states.

19 In terms of dead voter, there were a
20 lot of people voting in the name of the dead,
21 big numbers of people committing these
22 frauds, and relatively view of these allegations

32

1 turned out to be accurate, in terms of the
2 verifications by the newspapers themselves,
3 election officials, and criminal investigators.
4 Often the problem turned out to be the result of 5 administrative error, poll workers mismarking
6 lists with the names of the people who voted.
7 There were a few cases of actual charges and 8 convictions of people voting or engaged in these 9 kind of activities. Interestingly, it seemed 10 that most of those cases involved the person
11 voting by absentee and voting again at the 12 polls. There were a handful of instances where 13 people voted early, and voted on Election Day,
14 although some of that seemed to be confusion
15 about what you are allowed to do.

16 There were a number of vote fraud
17 cases, and these are completely focused in the 18 midwest and the south. And you will see in the 19 vote buying summary that's in there, three or 20 four locations where this seems to be a 21 perennial problem, and it doesn't seem to be 22 that much of a problem in other parts of the

1 country.

2 Deceptive practices, we saw a lot of

3 that come out in 2004. You probably all heard
4 about it the fliers, and the phone calls with 5 miss information about voting procedures. A
6 disproportionate number of them from 7 battleground states, in Florida, Ohio, and 8 Pennsylvania, only one case, and this is just 9 from news articles, was actually investigated.
10 That was the case in Oregon where the FBI did
11 investigate the destruction of voter
12 registration forms that were filled out by 13 people and then destroyed allegedly, according 14 to one party, but there were no other reports of 15 prosecutions on this case or on any of the other
16 deceptive practices cases.

17 There were surprisingly few articles
18 about non-citizen voting, something you heard a 19 lot about, but not something that seems to 20 happen very much.

21 On felon voting, there were only 13
22 actual cases, but they all involved rather large

34

1 numbers of people. You probably know this. A
2 lot of it is coming out of the Washington State
3 situation and the Wisconsin situation.

4 And, finally, with respect to fraud
5 being committed by election officials, I think
6 that's very hard to judge from news reports
7 because it is very difficult to make that 8 distinction between something was in error and 9 when something was done purposely and with 10 malfeasance in an actual crime. So that's

11 probably not the best way to look at that, and 12 that's what I have for that.

13 And, again, I know this is jumping
14 ahead, but I will say it now because I feel the 15 need to. These search terms that we used and 16 what these search terms came up with, and there
17 may be subsequent articles about these that 18 would go further in telling you how the actual 19 allegation was resolved, whether it turned out
20 to be accurate or not. One of my main
21 suggestions that I will talk about more later
22 on, if there is a next phase of this, that using

35

1 the charts that have already been created to
2 follow up nexus research to see if there were 3 further articles about the same cases to see
4 what happened. Because although I have a slot
5 in there, a column in there for subsequent 6 resolution, you will see it's not filled in very 7 often, and that's it.

8 And if there are any questions.

9 MR. ROKITA: Can you just review for 10 me what the purpose of gathering all this was,
11 in relation to our statutory guideline here?

12 MS. WANG: Well, we're trying to just 13 sort of get the lay of the land on this issue.
14 And, obviously, doing the nexus search alone
15 would not have provided that but we felt it
16 would be one useful tool in trying to do an 17 initial gauge of what's going on, also,
18 including the interviews, including the existing 19 research and the cases that Job will be talking

20 about.

21 MR. ROKITA: And the interviews we 22 had, we asked them for their ideas for 36

1 developing nationwide statistics and methods of 2 identifying or developing ways of identifying or 3 deferring, investigating voter intimidation, or 4 did we just try to get color from them as to 5 what the main issue was?

6 MS. WANG: No. We asked every single
7 person we talked to what their thoughts were on 8 how to improve the system, what ought to be done
9 to reform it and solve some of these problems.
10 It was an open-ended question. We didn't say do
11 you favor the development of national statistics
12 or something.

13 MR. ROKITA: Or how you would do it.

14 MS. WANG: That I will talk about
15 later. We limited that aspect of it to talking 16 to people who were basically political
17 scientists, who I think are in the best position
18 to tell us what is a scientifically sound method
19 for trying to get some kind of accurate take on 20 this.

21 MS. WANG: Chandler Davidson, and I
22 have the list with me. It talks about other

37

1 political scientists for the methodology issue.

2 MR. SEREBROV: Aside from DOJ cases,
3 closed DOG cases, which were put in a separate

Transcript 051806

4 chart initially, I came up with a laundry list
5 of search terms, and then Tova looked at that
6 list and added another list of search terms.
7 So by the time we got it to the Commission to 8 run the electronic search, the terms were 9 probably two pages long. And what, in essence,
10 we came up with was the first hundred cases for 11 each term. The result was about 44,000 cases
12 that I had to go through and ferret out, and 13 these were both federal and state cases, federal 14 where both a felon, and the district cases,
15 state cases were only appellant cases. These 16 were all cases that impact on some aspect of 17 voter fraud or voter intimidation. What emerged
18 from this was almost striking because there were 19 very few cases of the 44,00 cases or so that 20 actually were on point. And the ones that are 21 on point sometimes repeated categories. They 22 are all in these chart forms.

38

1 what I suggest is done in the next
2 phase is to concentrate on finding cases on the 3 state district court level, because it seems
4 like on a state level, a lot of voter fraud
5 cases are brought there and end there. And you
6 get a lot of information out of those cases, but 7 they are never appealed, so you never get 8 anywhere beyond that.

9 Without having to just go through
10 this and verbatim read, the patterns have 11 definitely shifted from outright stealing of 012407

12 elections in the past to different kinds of 13 problems, voter registration, identification,
14 ballot counting, overseas ballot problems, vote
15 buying, challenges to felon eligibility to vote.
16 And those were really the main categories that 17 went into the charts. And what I was surprised 18 to find is that out of each search term and the 19 cases under it, we had literally dozens and 20 dozens that were inapplicable. Oh, and I need
21 to add a caveat, in general, not all the time,
22 but in general, when we had an election

39

1 challenge case, in other words, someone lost an
2 election and they were challenging, we almost
3 always threw those out, unless they presented a
4 unique situation that directly was impacted by 5 the search term itself. In other words, if it
6 wasn't just -- I won, you lost, but the reason
7 was because there was X fraud done.

8 MR. SEREBROV: Right. So we threw
9 out 99 percent of those cases. What we have are 10 a number of charts with few cases, surprisingly
11 few cases. And my suggestion at the next phase,
12 they do a nationwide sampling of state cases on 13 the district court or circuit court level to 14 find out really what's going on.

15 Any questions?

16 MS. SIMS: No questions from the 17 attorneys?

18 MR. ROKITA: How would the sampling
19 be done.

Transcript 051806

20 MR. SEREBROV: Good question. What I
21 think you need to do is actually go, pick both
22 large counties and small counties, and you need □ 40

1 to go to the counties and you actually need to
2 run the records, and you need to go back a
3 certain amount of years and start looking at 4 those files. You're looking at a lot of work, a
5 lot of money going into this, but what we found
6 at that level is inadequate to draw conclusions,
7 unfortunately.

8 And as Tova said, I asked four
9 different Supreme Court Justices to give us
10 interviews. Three of them were afraid because 11 this type of case may come up again.

12 MS. WANG: Although not really too
13 much.

14 MR. SEREBROV: No, but it was very 15 helpful in some other areas.

16 MS. SIMS: We're five minutes ahead
17 of schedule. I don't know if you want to go
18 through this definition or the findings first.
19 Let's do the findings, I guess, first.

20 MS. WANG: So the next thing on the 21 agenda is to hear back from all of you about 22 your perceptions, given the research that we □ 41

1 did. I know that all of you have tremendous
2 backgrounds in this, and we all come out with
3 different experiences, but I think today it

4 would be helpful to focus -- the first question,
5 I guess, is basically, given the research and 6 the findings that we have, what at this point do
7 you think we can say about how much fraud and 8 intimidation there has been since the 2000
9 election, and how much are certain frauds being 10 committed as opposed to others?

11 what is your sense of what the 12 landscape is, anybody?

13 MR. WEINBERG: I have a question to 14 you. Given all this work that you have done, 15 and it's a lot of work, what do you think is 16 missing?

17 MS. WANG: That's what I need to ask
18 you.

19 MR. SEREBROV: That comes later, we
20 ask you that. We have talked about this.

21 MS. WANG: We have talked about steps
22 for further action, but are you thinking of 42

1 something specific?

2 MR. WEINBERG: Do you feel like
3 there's areas of information that exist that you
4 just didn't get to or do you feel like you, in
5 your breath of what you did, sort of captured
6 the information that's available out there?

7 MS. WANG: Well, I think we will talk
8 about this when we talk about further steps.
9 They are kind of interrelated, but I feel like 10 in terms of the nexus articles and the 11 literature, I want follow-up on all of them

12 because a lot of them came out of the 2002, 2004
13 elections where there was a lot thrown around.
14 A lot of statements are made.

15 One of the things that we said about 16 the literature is that the books that are 17 written are of the least use because they have 18 written by people with agendas on both sides.
19 Allegations are made of things happening. And 20 even I started to do just like for fun kind of 21 looking at the allegations made at some of the 22 books and reports, and doing my nexus search,

43

1 and Google search, and finding out a month later
2 there was a completely opposite allegation than 3 what was suggested in the book on the report.
4 That's what I feel like is missing because
5 that's how the misinformation that's out there
6 about what's really going on seems to be, is 7 that people make a certain assumption right
8 after Election Day, and I will tell you
9 something, and this is sort of going off point,
10 but I think actually journalists are actually
11 somewhat responsible for this themselves.
12 I know this will amaze you that journalists can 13 be -- I'm trying to work on a separate project
14 and they will write an article. There was X, Y,
15 and Z, happened on Election Day, and then it
16 turns out three weeks later that actually 17 something completely different happened, but 18 they don't report on that. Or it's like this 19 side, the first one was on the front page, not

20 that this is particularly relevant. I am trying 21 to get a grant to do journalist training
22 seminars on these issues to try and solve some

1 of the problems, but almost everybody does it.
2 I mean, the stuff that lawyers committee comes 3 out with, great. The ACVR came out with its 4 report, but that's a snapshot in time, so
5 whatever happened did not turn out to be true.

6 MR. SEREBROV: One thing we left out
7 were allegations. We did not handle any 8 particular allegations.

9 MS. WANG: It was too much.

10 MR. SEREBROV: And that's something
11 that in the next phase, we may want done.

12 MR. HEARNE: What's the distinction?

13 MR. SEREBROV: We handled things that
14 have become legal issues that went to trial.

15 MS. WANG: That's not really true.
16 The articles is just everything that came out.

17 MR. HEARNE: It sounds like your
18 search would pick up somebody alleged something,
19 it gets reported in the paper. That would be 20 picked up.

21 MS. WANG: What's in the charts, as 22 you have them in and out. There is a category

45

1 for subsequent resolution. As I am suggesting,
2 what I would love to do actually, if we had the
3 resources today, is now do a new nexus search
4 that would specifically search for those cases

5 and see what the follow-up was. I was limited
6 because we had an agreement on what search terms
7 were. I couldn't go beyond that to look
8 specifically to see if there was in this case
9 some kind of further reporting.

10 So it was an allegation. Obviously,
11 the cases were more official than that.

12 MR. SEREBROV: When we discussed this 13 in the beginning, we were not going to deal with 14 hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of 15 allegations out there, except the nexus
16 articles. That's something that one may or may 17 not want to deal with. It's very tricky. You
18 have to weigh the voracity of those allegations.

19 MS. WANG: And how do you do that.
20 It's a problem we talked about with a lot of 21 people we interviewed, how do you make that line
22 of distinction between what is simply someone

46

1 saying something, and something that at least
2 has a kernel of merits.

3 MR. SEREBROV: For instance, we
4 talked to Sharon Priest. She was Secretary of 5 State from Arkansas. She indicated that the 6 State Board of Election Commissioners had
7 fielded, over a certain amount of years, a
8 number of complaints, and they gave those to us
9 but we didn't go through each individual
10 complaint.

11 Now, that's something that may or may 12 not be a valid thing, but if states keeps those

Transcript 051806

13 complaints on file, if they are categorized, if 14 there is enough information, that may or may not 15 be something that one wants to do. It's almost 16 an adjusting linkage. The problem is people
17 call in all the time, as Peggy well knows.

18 when I was an election commissioner,
19 people called in and complained about everything
20 from my dog was stealing votes to --

21 MS. WANG: Or my dog voted.

22 MR. SEREBROV: Obviously, the

1 machines have been frauded out, and where do you
2 draw the line between a valid one and non-valid
3 one.

4 MR. PEREZ: I realize I am a resource
5 person but I'd like to make a comment. I was
6 very skeptical before I came to this group
7 because of the issue, but I agree wholeheartedly
8 with your research. I am glad you did it. The 9 summaries, I think, were right on, and your 10 notes here about structural forms of 11 disenfranchisement and internal abuse of the 12 system, you're hitting right on the key here.

13 Most of the issues are not that
14 somebody is stealing votes. It's just that poll
15 workers are not trained properly. We see this 16 time and time again. I am glad to see that 17 you're coming out with the same conclusions that 18 we have on the front line. It's not so much 19 that there is a conspiracy. You're going to 20 have vote buying. You're going to have some of 21 the things, but generally negligible, not enough

22 to alter things. And if there is, they need to 48

1 be prosecuted and come up with stronger laws.
2 But those of us that do this time and time again
3 can see where people have just missed the boat
4 in preparing either the people, the equipment,
5 the programing or something, and the obligation
6 should be laid squarely on the election
7 official, not on the equipment.

8 MS. WANG: Or the voter.

9 MR. PEREZ: Or some other type of 10 issue. we're playing the process on their 11 shoulder, and not necessarily training them
12 properly. So I am glad to see you're 13 researching.

14 MS. WANG: Actually, I think I
15 skipped over it but I was talking about the 16 interviews. One of the most common things that 17 was said was, generally, poll worker training,
18 that could be the number one key to solving the 19 problems we're talking about, and also longer
20 voting times, and maybe having days other than 21 Election Day that you can vote, not necessarily 22 in terms of early voting, but like weekend 49

1 voting. Maybe combine this with fewer voting
2 locations, because the thought was that you
3 could then have the best and the brightest of 4 the poll workers. That's something for another

5 study.

6 MR. SEREBROV: They are actually
7 doing that in Arkansas. I didn't even know we 8 had Saturday voting. We crossed a poll that was 9 open, so I went in and voted. They have opened
10 several, not a lot, but a few polls for Saturday
11 voting.

12 MR. GREENBAUM: Would it be fair to 13 say that taking up the issue of intimidation
14 that you're finding suggests that most fraud
15 occurs outside of the polling place?

16 MS. WANG: I would say yes, right.
17 It's absentee ballot fraud which is troubling
18 because there is this huge movement to expand
19 that, frankly. And so while I think this is 20 also probably going beyond what we're supposed
21 to be talking about right now but, why not,
22 everyone else is doing it. That is a political

50

1 issue that I think is not going to go away.
2 People seem to be pushing relentlessly for mail
3 voting or more absentee voting, on both sides of 4 the spectrum actually.

5 MR. GREENBAUM: I am including, when
6 I say fraud, I am including all deceptive
7 practices, the fliers, the calls, all of those 8 things that came up during election process in 9 2004.

10 MS. WANG: No. Well, there were 11 people talking about poll workers engaging in 12 fraud. Are you saying taking away the voter

13 intimidation?

14 MR. GREENBAUM: I'm saying take out
15 the voter intimidation issues, in terms of the 16 issue of fraud, in terms of the other things on 17 both sides, whether you're talking about voters
18 committing voter fraud or whether you're talking
19 about actions that are designed to keep voters
20 away, from deceptive practices, tearing up
21 registration forms, those sorts of things. Most 22 of that is happening outside of the polling

51

1 place.

2 MS. WANG: I would agree with that.
3 That's what almost everyone says.

4 MR. ROKITA: Thank you. I'd like to 5 have a little bit of discussion around before we
6 go too far down, subsequent matters, because I
7 may be a little bit confused, figure out what
8 our enabling legislature is here. I am reading
9 the cover letter of my invitation, and I'll read
10 it into the record, if you will bear with me.
11 "Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 12 2002 requires the EAC to conduct research on 13 election administration issues."

14 Yes. Among the tasks listed in the 15 statute is the development of the nationwide
16 statistics and methods of identifying,
17 deterring, investigating, voting fraud in 18 elections for federal office, 241(e)(6), and 19 secondly, ways of identifying, deterring, and 20 investigating methods of voter intimidation,

21 241(b)(7).

22 And this kind of goes to the reason I
52

1 asked the question about the interviews. I'm
2 hearing conclusions here about whether or not
3 the EAC is going to determine whether or not
4 there is voter fraud and where. And the statute
5 seems to point out, it is assuming, whether 6 right or wrong in the statute, Congress will 7 assume voter fraud existed, and it is asking the 8 EAC to develop nationwide statistics and methods
9 of identifying, deterring.

10 MS. WANG: That's what we were going
11 to try to do. We're not making the assumption.
12 We're not saying there isn't fraud. We're 13 trying to get a grasp of where that fraud tends 14 to lie and what types of fraud actually seem to 15 be occurring. I don't think that you can get to 16 the point of identifying these other matters
17 that you referred to in the statute without 18 first doing the research to find out what is 19 going on.

20 MR. ROKITA: It's not a comment on 21 your research, whether it's good or bad, right
22 or wrong, but I am trying to get us focused on 53

1 our mission here. From the preliminary comments
2 I am hearing, it's whether or not there is fraud
3 and where it is. And I think what you mentioned
4 in your opening remarks is that we lack 5 statistics. We lack methods for getting to

Transcript 051806

6 these statistics. And I would just like some 7 feedback and input from this group as to if they 8 agree or not that that should really be the 9 focus, more developmental ideas how to get the 10 information, rather than opinions of 11 interviewees.

12 MS. WANG: This is an initial 13 methodology. This combination of not just 14 interviews but nexus of the cases is an initial 15 step in a methodology. Later on, I will be 16 going through with I found with the political 17 scientists, further findings from more
18 scientists with the methodology that can be 19 added on to what we have already done. That is 20 the next layer up.

21 MR. SEREBROV: The other thing you
22 have to understand is we were limited in both

54

1 time and funds. So what we were able to
2 delivery is just a peek at what's going on.

3 MS. SIMS: It is only intended a
4 preliminary research so we can decide how might
5 we get to the next step, and that's why we need
6 you in here to help us.

7 MR. SEREBROV: One area that we
8 didn't touch that we were told don't touch is 9 complaints or potential fraud having to do with 10 computer voting with the machines themselves.

11 MS. WANG: Thank God.

12 MR. SEREBROV: That's true. That's a
13 can of worms.

Transcript 051806

14 MR. HEARNE: I wasn't here the first
15 15 minutes. My cab driver was somewhat lost,
16 but that being said, so I didn't get the 17 opportunity to hear exactly what the discussion
18 was about the work product. At the end of the 19 day, we have an objective of producing 20 something.

21 I understood todd to be saying what
22 we're supposed to be producing is given what

55

1 information we have and the consensus within
2 this group, what is a methodology for tracking,
3 quantifying, and reporting these kinds of 4 incidences going forward.

5 MS. SIMS: Well, you may not even
6 have to come up with a methodology. What we're 7 looking for, how do we meet this requirement.
8 Or as I said, we also serve as a national 9 clearinghouse for the administration of federal 10 elections. There may be things that relate to 11 this that we should be looking at, that relate
12 to the issue of voting fraud. There may be best 13 practices in certain areas that we maybe should 14 be looking at that we haven't already started to 15 look at.

16 MR. HEARNE: So the EAC is coming in,
17 the working group says, give us some ideas.

18 MS. SIMS: Where we need to go.

19 MR. HEARNE: Tracking as we go
20 through.

21 MS. SIMS: Please don't use a

012420

22 four-letter word when you say where we need to 56

1 go.

2 MR. BAUER: You made a comment. Did
3 you have a concern about consulting experts?
4 You were concerned we were talking to experts,
5 getting opinions from experts, or you thought it
6 was a methodological approach.

7 MR. ROKITA: I'm just trying to
8 determine what our mission here is at the core
9 level and whether it should be making a
10 conclusory report as to whether or not something
11 exists, or is our mission more plain language,
12 the development of the methodologies that would 13 lead to something like statistics and
14 methodologies, not an amalgamation of opinions
15 as to whether or not voter fraud exists and 16 where it is. Because we could keep adding to 17 that, then we're putting the EAC -- or EAC is 18 going to be in a position of saying -- of adding 19 to the universe of opinions.

20 MS. WANG: These are actually not 21 just opinions. If you look at the people we 22 spoke to, there were election officials. 57

1 MR. ROKITA: All of whom have
2 opinions. Yes, I understand.

3 MS. WANG: Well, opinions based on
4 actual experience.

5 MR. BAUER: That's what my question

6 was.

7 MR. SEREBROV: But it is a method of 8 identifying election fraud.

9 MS. WANG: Any political scientist.
10 And if you look at the methodologies that were 11 suggested to me, every single one of them talks 12 about interviewing a range of people involved in 13 the process.

14 MR. ROKITA: These might be
15 experiences.

16 MR. SEREBROV: We originally had a
17 political scientist on this group, a third
18 person who had to withdraw, and that is Steve,
19 who we actually interviewed after.

20 MS. SIMS: He can speak for the EAC
21 that we're not expecting the group to say there
22 is or there is not fraud. We're not expecting

58

1 that. I think we know there are instances of
2 it.

3 At this point in time, what we're
4 trying to do is get a handle on how we can
5 develop nationwide statistics, and investigating
6 voter fraud and voter intimidation.

7 MS. WANG: To know how to investigate
8 and deter fraud and intimidation, you have to 9 first get some sort of a grasp as to what the 10 actual problems were, and where your energy and 11 resources ought to be focused.

12 MR. ROKITA: Yes, you have to do
13 that. I am not basing things after our

14 experience, but we don't know that this
15 experience is a fair sampling of what's out
16 there. And as I read those interviews and what 17 I heard you say at the beginning is we don't 18 have statistics. So, in essence, even these 19 experiences are based on non-quantifiable
20 experiences and things that might have happened,
21 and opinions.

22 MS. WANG: That's a major question of 59

1 this project, is any of this quantifiable. I
2 don't think you're ever going to come up with a
3 number, so how do you get at it?

4 MR. ROKITA: That's a fair agenda
5 item for this discussion. Maybe at the end of 6 day, we decide we stop spending taxpayer money
7 or it's going to be too much to spend to find
8 that kind of data.

9 MR. SEREBROV: I think we're going to 10 find that's the answer.

11 MR. ROKITA: Otherwise, we will stop
12 it here and recognize there is a huge difference
13 of opinion on that issue of fraud when it occurs
14 is obtainable, and that would possibly be a
15 conclusion of the EAC.

16 MS. SIMS: I don't know if the EAC
17 would come to a conclusion like that. Again,
18 it's all going to have to go back to the 19 Commissioners and they are going to have 20 discussions about, what they can pursue in this
21 area, but here are a couple things that I am

22 looking at. This is just from being in this 60

1 field a long time. It may be difficult to -- I
2 don't think it's going to be impossible to get
3 exact statistics on voting fraud.

4 Can we take another step and get
5 better statistics on voting fraud, that is one
6 question. The other question is, is there a way
7 of identifying at this point certain parts in 8 the election process that are more vulnerable,
9 that we should be addressing.

10 MS. WANG: That's what I am trying to 11 say.

12 MR. GINSBERG: I guess I am curious
13 about why there is some academic work being done
14 about this when, in fact, in six months, you
15 have got the ultimate laboratory. Why would you
16 not come out with some sort of methodology to go
17 into all the polling places where there may be 18 an issue, with what amounts to a bipartisan
19 team, and take a look at it.

20 MS. WANG: That was actually in a
21 couple at least of the suggestions of 22 methodologies from the political scientist, but

61

1 imagine the resources that it would take to get.

2 MR. GINSBERG: Truthfully, minimum.
3 I admit that my background and prejudices are
4 probably not where the political scientist's
5 are, as an academic matter.

6 MR. BAUER: Ben is a former

012424

7 journalist.

8 MR. GINSBERG: In the last election,
9 for example, in the Republican Party and the 10 Democratic Party, there were pretty good
11 samplings of precincts that had a Republican and 12 Democrat, probably 10,000 precincts around the 13 country more or less. Why would you not have a 14 Republican and a Democrat in each one of those?
15 With all due respect to the voters, a lot of 16 those groups are going to be perceived as 17 partisan, but I mean --

18 MR. GINSBERG: Maybe perceived but to 19 make it valid, you need to have representatives
20 of the parties conducting this and taking a look 21 at precincts, any precinct anybody wants in the 22 country where you're thinking there may be

62

1 intimidation, where there may be fraud. And
2 instead of turning it into some sort of 3 political charge pre election, actually have 4 observers from both parties in the places where
5 this is most likely to occur, and see if it
6 occurs and how it occurs.

7 MS. WANG: The problem with having it
8 limited to those jurisdictions where you suspect
9 that it's very likely bad things will happen is 10 then you have a skewed result.

11 MR. GINSBERG: Well, I think you I
12 said any precinct anybody wanted to put people.

13 MR. GREENBAUM: Which sometimes you
14 don't know there's going to be problems. who

15 knew that Dilluth, Minnesota. We certainly had 16 no awareness that Dilluth, Minnesota was going 17 to be an area where Indian voters were going to 18 get intimidated at the polls.

19 My other concern is, a lot of times,
20 that is things outside of what either party
21 cares about. Sometimes there are maybe in 22 places where you have partisan elections that

63

1 are going to be very close. Sometimes the
2 issues involve nonpartisan elections.

3 MR. GINSBERG: I don't disagree with
4 that. It can be any place where anybody
5 perceives a problem.

6 MR. SEREBROV: But one of the 7 questions was absentee ballots, how do you deal
8 with absentee ballots at a polling place.

9 MR. HEARNE: I think Ben's discussion
10 is a good one. The point he is saying, we have 11 a great laboratory coming up in terms of an 12 election. We can go back through next Tuesday,
13 that is all variable. I'm not saying it's not 14 at all, but the concept of being able to say
15 here's an election upcoming we're developing.
16 If you're going to need to develop some 17 methodology to study it, you can develop the 18 methodology looking forward to the event.

19 MR. SEREBROV: wouldn't it be better
20 to wait for 2008?

21 MR. HEARNE: If you look forward to 22 that, and take the two stakeholders in the

1 election, which are going to be the party -- the 2 two parties, and figure out a way where you find
3 your hottest, most concerned polling places, we 4 will find the ones. You could do some 5 statistical analysis, find out ones that have 6 the greatest aberration, and try to identify
7 them, whatever way you want to do it.

8 MR. BAUER: If I may, this is 9 probably not the first time I have made an 10 unwise suggestion. I think from a whole host of 11 respects, it is very, very difficult to sell.
12 First of all, I don't think the American public
13 is going to want an election system where two 14 parties are involved in the election system.
15 Secondly, anybody who's served the parties would 16 know how quickly they will arrive at 17 understanding workers in polling places.

18 I tend to get along with Republicans,
19 but I doubt this would be anything other than 20 attractive and efficient controversial effort.

21 And the last point I would make is,
22 you're introducing a variable into the very

65

1 thing you want to study. If you announce
2 political parties are going out into the field,
3 you're going to affect behavior and you're going
4 to end up changing the subject you are
5 undertaking to study. It is not scientific,
6 will have zero credibility, and it is not what a

7 U.S. Government enterprise should go through.

8 MR. GINSBERG: The point was, you're
9 not looking to monitor the sanctity of American
10 elections. What you're looking for is valid
11 data to collect. And part of the problem that I
12 think you've got with the data you're collecting
13 is you're not sure how true it is. You are not 14 sure how much is political charges. You are not 15 sure, as you said, it is the charge that is made
16 one day all over the front page but straightened
17 out three weeks later. This is for data
18 collection purposes. This isn't about
19 monitoring the sanctity of the election.

20 MR. BAUER: The data collectors don't
21 have any credibility. The two major party
22 organizations in this country are not neutral

66

1 collectors of data. Everything they are going
2 to collect is going to be collected in a
3 partisan way. That is true on your side. We're 4 not going to be able to persuade anybody that
5 this is anything different.

6 MS. WANG: We already have -- the
7 Department of Justice has a major observer
8 program.

9 MR. WEINBERG: The article lays out
10 exactly how the justice department finds the 11 polling places to put observers in. And it also 12 collects examples of the observer report fields.
13 So this -- and internationally, those of us who 14 have done international stuff know we do pretty

15 much the same thing, and they use pretty much
16 the same kind of forms. The fact of the matter
17 is that I think you can get a lot of data, you
18 can get it on a form. And the fact that people
19 are two different political parties doesn't mean
20 they are going to try to lie on forms. If it
21 does, things are pretty sad.

22 The other thing is that you do affect 67

1 the election, and that's not bad. One of the
2 great, great saving graces of the observer
3 function is it opens everything up. You have
4 transparency. First time you don't have people
5 wondering what's going on in the polling places.
6 You have people knowing what is going on in the 7 polling places. And there's ways to control
8 them. They can sit in particular places. If 9 they have complaints, they can complaint to the 10 precinct chair.

11 There are things that you can do and 12 there are ways to organize it, and you can
13 figure out which polling places, what goal
14 you're trying to achieve that you can get
15 information. If you get it every election,
16 every year for the 25 years, I have seen and 17 it's doable. Will it take a lot of people,
18 sure. Take organizing, yes, but you know,
19 organizing is what you want, if you're going to 20 get data. Is it going to be scientifically
21 reliable, I don't know. I don't know if there
22 is anything that can be done, having read all

Transcript 051806

8 access in the polling place. This is a problem
9 for us in law enforcement. We can know that 10 something is going to go on. If we were told
11 something was going to go on in Polling Place 3
12 in ward 4 in Chicago, we could send somebody in 13 there. I guess we could. Bad example.

14 MS. WANG: That's the recommendation
15 that we come out to change or encourage states
16 to change that.

17 MR. DONSANTO: But in terms of your
18 ability to employ something now, it's an 19 obstacle you have to overcome.

20 Secondly, and I think Barry touched
21 on this --

22 MR. SEREBROV: Maybe we'd overcome it
70

1 if you get a candidate to appoint you as a poll
2 worker.

3 MR. DONSANTO: Then you get into a
4 position where you're skewing data. That's 5 where you're politicizing more so than just a
6 party watcher.

7 MR. SEREBROV: You can get the
8 parties to authorize you.

9 MR. DONSANTO: In Virginia, they
10 don't have poll watchers in Virginia. If a 11 candidate were to try to put a poll cashier in 12 Virginia, he would be kicked out, and most 13 states follow that rule, whatever.

14 The other thing is that I think it
15 was brought up early on in what you all

16 presented here, the types of things that go
17 wrong inside polling places are really not
18 representative of the uniform of things that go
19 wrong. The types of things -- there used to be 20 a time when election fraud was committed by poll
21 officers who just stole elections, but during 22 the past 30 or 40 years that I've been watching

71

1 this stuff, the election administration business
2 has become more professionalized. And when you
3 have a professional sort of approach to the job
4 of administering elections, although there may 5 be something there that is representing a
6 political party, your loyalty goes beyond that 7 to the process. And it's becoming extremely
8 rare, extremely rare today, to find polling
9 officials that are complacent in election fraud,
10 whereas 30, 40 years ago, it was not unusual at 11 all.

12 So you know the kind of methodologies
13 that you've been talking about are not, for 14 example, going to allow you to capture
15 information on things that take place at the 16 polling place. It is not going to allow to you
17 capture information on intimidating voters,
18 absentee ballots. The situation is very hard to 19 measure.

20 MR. WEINBERG: It will give you
21 information on the difference in treatment of 22 voters that happens frequently, and it will give

72

Transcript 051806

1 you other information about what happens as far
2 as the process, and whether the process is being
3 followed.

4 Professional balloting is a huge
5 question that's come up. Nobody knows how that 6 works anywhere, and whatever happens to those 7 ballots, I mean, come on. There are things that 8 you can learn about problems that contribute to 9 the distrust of the election process, even 10 though you probably wouldn't see a whole lot of 11 direct fraud.

12 MS. WANG: Again, the provisional
13 ballot is an interesting issue to raise.
14 Michael McDonald, who worked on the election day
15 study, he and I have talk about this a lot.
16 Section 203 covered jurisdictions, there was 17 more use of provisional ballots than in any kind
18 of jurisdiction. Can you start to draw
19 conclusions from that? So that's another thing
20 that you can look at.

21 MR. WEINBERG: I'll just interject
22 one more thing. There is the re-authorization

73

1 of the Voting Rights act, that what we ought to
2 do is cut loose the observing from the 3 technically special covered jurisdictions and 4 have them be able to be assigned nationwide with 5 specific criteria, and that would help a lot of 6 the problems.

7 MR. BAUER: Our mandate here is to

8 look at the research. I disagree with the 9 secretary. I think some of the preliminary work
10 is absolutely essential to the credibility, to 11 the thoughtfulness and integrity of the effort,
12 but I don't think that, as I read this, this 13 means that our judgement is that we leave the 14 work that's been done today and create a hybrid 15 project which has as its aim to function as 16 improvement on current observing programs.
17 That's just not our mandate.

18 MR. GINSBERG: So our goal is to have
19 bad elections so we can get good data?

20 MS. WANG: You may be familiar with 21 this work by a woman named Susan Hyde,
22 University of San Diego, doing a comparison

74

1 where there are observers as compared to where
2 there are not observers.

3 MS. ROGERS: I'd like to suggest, in 4 addition to party observing, states put their 5 own observing on the ground. When you come into 6 a state, unless you immerse yourself in that
7 state's laws and that state's procedures, often
8 you don't know what you're observing. You don't 9 know if what you're seeing is legal or illegal.

10 We did work with lawyers committee
11 and election protection, and reviewed a lot of 12 their information, sent back edits. We audited
13 some of their training classes and gave feedback
14 to those training classes. We had a lot of 15 community hotline communication on Election Day

16 where they called to tell us what they received.
17 Not everyone does that, but we're unable to 18 quantify what is observed or what is alleged as 19 fraud because the complaint doesn't come to us.
20 It may go to either party and they not share
21 that information with the local jurisdiction or 22 with the state election official.

75

1 we've put 80 to 100 observing from
2 the Secretary of State's Office on the ground
3 since 2002. We provide them with radios set up
4 like a little war room. They call us when there
5 is a problem and we immediately have someone
6 there to find out what that problem is. They 7 write up reports, and they are able to take
8 those reports, and we know where we need to go
9 and what areas need to be shored up. This 10 allows us to have the ability to change the 11 process, if something needs to be changed.

12 Another thing, as far as parties in 13 our state, now the parties, rather than having 14 to be appointed as a poll watcher by a
15 candidate, each party is allowed to appoint up
16 to 25 statewide poll watchers. These people can 17 go anywhere they want to go. It seems to work
18 very well.

19 MR. SEREBROV: I wanted to make two 20 points. One was a reaction to some of the 21 comments before. I know Arkansas and lot of 22 southern states, both the parties and the 76

Transcript 051806

1 candidates are allowed to have watchers in every
2 poll. The other thing is, in Arkansas, the 3 Secretary of State doesn't have the statutory
4 authority to do what you're doing in Georgia. I
5 wish they did. It would make my life a lot
6 easier, especially in the past, and it would
7 make Tim Humphrey's life a lot easier, if you
8 knew Tim. But really it's a state by state
9 problem. I don't have a gist -- and this is 10 something we talked about, there was also a
11 sampling of state law in the next phase to see
12 where the bugs are in that system.

13 MS. ROGERS: In Georgia, some of you
14 may know we have a state election board who has 15 authority. I actually yesterday pulled a list
16 of cases that we investigated in 2004. I don't 17 have the 2005 ones on here, but I can tell you
18 right now, of all of these cases right here, the 19 state election board investigated the majority
20 of these were absentee ballots.

21 MS. WANG: well, I wish that every
22 state did what you did, then we could just add

77

1 them all up. One thing we found, of course,
2 almost no states do that. Also, we spoke to 3 your successor, John Tanner. And the Federal
4 Government, the Department of Justice keeps a
5 database of what comes in but they will not
6 release that information to us. And they also 7 would not release to us any more than a few
8 dozen of the observer reports, which we also

9 think might be useful.

10 MS. ROGERS: We've seen a high
11 success rate, not in deferring fraud, but in 12 deferring the actions of election officials and 13 poll workers. Those actions where you talked 14 about you can't determine if they are fraud but 15 yet they appear to be a lack of attention to 16 detail. We bring these people up regularly.
17 And when you bring them up in front of their 18 peers, it is a huge deterrence. And you're 19 correct, every case we have brought forward, it
20 has not been an instance of fraud.

21 MS. SIMS: well, I was wondering,
22 before we continue on, because we're already

78

1 getting some ideas for possible areas and it
2 might be worthwhile just to put these ideas
3 down, even though I am certainly not looking at 4 this as all one project. Some of these things
5 are not going to be one project, and some things
6 will be more problematic and may not be
7 something we can do right away.

8 For example, for a number of reasons,
9 we couldn't do observers in this fall's
10 election, not the least of which is financial.
11 We probably won't have a budget, '07 budget, by 12 then. But actually, before we go on to this,
13 would it be okay if we talked about the 14 definition of voting fraud. Particularly, I'd 15 like to get into intimidation and suppression
16 areas.

Transcript 051806

17 If you don't have copies of that, we 18 can quickly run off some copies. One of the 19 reasons why I think this is of concern,
20 obviously, it would be helpful if we all knew
21 what we meant when we were talking about voter 22 fraud or voter intimidation. As we progress in

79

1 terms of what we want to research or how we want
2 to identify it or develop projects to identify
3 and deter and investigate, we have some common
4 ground.

5 MS. WANG: Did people get a chance to
6 look at the definition, and were there
7 objections?

8 MR. DONSANTO: Comments. The 9 definition in the opening paragraph of this is,
10 I think, taken from something that's kind of the 11 operational way that we articulate what voter 12 fraud is as distinguished from the types of 13 things that go on in the process. So that's how 14 we define vote fraud.

15 MS. WANG: It is the sincerest form
16 of flattery.

17 MR. DONSANTO: Well, whatever.
18 However, since half of this program is not 19 directed so much at fraud but focuses on 20 intimidation, I think we need to define the term
21 intimidation. Intimidation is a term that in 22 the context of elections, in my experience, has

80

1 no meaning at all. It can mean anything that
2 happens to you in connection with voting that
3 you don't like or that happens to somebody that 4 supports you that you don't like to. And the 5 other extreme, somebody who gets killed or a
6 cross burned on his yard to retaliate against
7 them for having exercised a franchise.

8 The word fraud is a word that 9 connotes criminal. Criminal connotes that the 10 remedy for doing it is to put somebody in jail,
11 to afford that person all the procedural rights
12 given to someone in a criminal trial, including 13 the right to counsel, and obligation of the 14 prosecutor to prove the case beyond a reasonable 15 doubt.

16 when applied to the word
17 intimidation, our research on the laws that 18 exist at the federal level has been that the 19 word intimidate in the criminal statutes means
20 to apply physical or economic duress upon a 21 victim in connection with a voting act. And if 22 you're going to use the word intimidate as you

□ 81

1 have in the fourth and fifth bullet from the 2 bottom on your page, I think accuracy would
3 require that you limit it to that.

4 MS. WANG: well, that is to me
5 personally -- I don't speak for Job. See if he
6 agrees with me on this. This is a major matter
7 of concern to me. One of the things that I have 8 been exploring in my own head is the idea of 9 changing that so that you can broaden the 10 criminal intimidation laws on the civil side.

11 MR. DON SANTO: That's a civil side,
12 that's a different issue. That's not fraud.
13 Fraud equals crime.

14 MS. WANG: Well, the question --

15 MR. DON SANTO: Intimidation, there
16 are a universe of activities that can be
17 directed at people in a category of voter
18 suppression which are not fraud, which are 19 directed in the political process. Signs are a 20 good example of that.

21 MS. WANG: I think they are not under 22 the criminal law fraud, but if you think of 82

1 fraud, and this is how we perceive fraud,
2 anything that distorts the system, the process,
3 then certainly, keeping people from voting has
4 the same distorting impact.

5 MR. DON SANTO: Yes, I agree with you.
6 The thing that you're leaving out is the word
7 corrupted, to affect an election campaign or 8 affects activities at the poll. Everything that 9 affects activities at the polls is encompassed
10 within your definition, and that encompasses 11 everything that occurs from the nominating 12 process on, criminal activity which is so
13 anti-social in that it warrants the ultimate
14 societal punishment, incarceration.

15 Now, I'm not going to tell you -- the 16 word I am focusing on here is intimidation.

17 There is an entirely another area having to do
18 with voter suppression which we're just
19 beginning to explore. And I give you an example
20 of how we're exploring this is the Tobin case
21 was sentenced yesterday. It was in The Post
22 yesterday. We're trying at justice to find ways

83

1 to get at using the statutes, which we have to
2 get at aggravated forms of voter suppression. A
3 maliciously designed denial of service directed
4 at a get-out-to-vote telephone bank sufficiently
5 possessed criminal malfeasance that the person
6 who does something like that should go to jail.
7 Mr. Tobin, who is the executive director of the 8 New England Region of the Republican Party, is 9 facing ten months as a guest of the Attorney
10 General of the United States. Somebody who puts 11 -- maliciously circulates posters that contain,
12 "Republicans vote on Tuesday, Democrats vote on 13 Wednesday."

14 If we could find the people who do
15 that sort of thing, that isn't voter
16 intimidation. That is voter suppression. And,
17 yes, that kind of conduct, if done for the 18 design of deterring someone from voting, ought 19 to be a crime. And I assure you we have 20 investigated every single instance that has been 21 brought to our attention, and every single 22 instance, when we did an investigation, we were

84

1 unable to find who did it.

Transcript 051806

2 MR. BAUER: I'd like to ask a
3 question. I'm not sure about the distinction
4 between suppression and intimidation.
5 Intimidation is a vehicle for achieving
6 suppression.

7 MR. DONSANTO: You're right.

8 MR. BAUER: In one sense, there may 9 not be any difference in intent or effect.

10 MR. DONSANTO: Right.

11 MR. BAUER: The second question I
12 wanted to ask you, if you deal with this 13 definitional change, if you talk about physical 14 or --

15 MR. DONSANTO: In the context of the 16 term of intimidation, I would limit it that way.

17 MR. BAUER: But intimidation is
18 related to suppression, in terms of Mr. Tobin.

19 MR. DONSANTO: No, his is not an
20 intimidation. That's corrupt suppression.

21 MR. BAUER: Here's my question.
22 Intimidation conducted on a systematic scale for

85

1 the purpose of driving people away from the
2 polls has a suppressive nature.

3 MR. DONSANTO: I don't disagree, but
4 the question becomes what methodology they are
5 using to achieve that result.

6 MR. BAUER: The point you made about
7 capping off the physical and economic portion.

8 MR. DONSANTO: As far as intimidation
9 is concerned. Suppression is a broader term.

10 MR. BAUER: Let's talk about that 11 part of intimidation because I think, quite 12 frankly, intimidation isn't done for the 13 psychological joy of the intimidator. It is to 14 drive people away from the polls.

15 Granted, the justice department will
16 be looking to converting it to criminally liable
17 behavior. It has the feel, tone, color, of 18 maliciously interfering with people's lives.

19 MR. DONSANTO: Corrupt. I think I
20 see where you're going.

21 MR. BAUER: What if you have a party
22 that dresses up people in para military so they 86

1 look like military soldiers, and sends them into
2 targeted polling places to yell at voters as 3 they walk in, that they need to produce their 4 IDs, showing it to these people. If you had 5 that on a widespread, organized basis, and it is 6 clearly an intimidating behavior, it is clearly
7 malicious, you wouldn't say that that's outside
8 the range of conduct you would be concerned
9 about.

10 MR. DONSANTO: Under the laws we have
11 to work with today, Bob, that's not corrupt.

12 MR. BAUER: But you think the laws
13 you work with are supple enough?

14 MR. DONSANTO: We're trying to bend
15 the ones we've got to address aggravated cases
16 of voter suppression, and the Tobin case is an 17 example of that. And you know how we do this,

18 if we won Tobin and we get a District Court
19 opinion, although he was acquitted on the 241
20 Count, if we got an opinion from the Court
21 saying the statute applies to this conduct,
22 that's the goal. You can bet the next time we

87

1 have a denying of service attack, we're going to
2 attack it the same way. whether we can then
3 take that case and make it apply to different
4 facts, we'll try.

5 MR. BAUER: That's what I wanted to
6 not.

7 MR. DONSANTO: But this is a work in
8 progress.

9 MS. WANG: Does this argue for a new 10 law?

11 MR. DONSANTO: I don't know that is a
12 policy question.

13 MR. HEARNE: Let me ask a question to 14 clarify that, to see where we are right now.

15 You mentioned the Tobin situation. The 16 allegation was often made and sometimes occurs
17 that an organization makes phone calls
18 intentionally misdirecting a voter to the wrong
19 poll, saying you have to bring eight forms of 20 identification, voting is on Wednesday.

21 MR. DONSANTO: That's false.
22 We would investigate that.

88

1 MR. GREENBAUM: Craig, can I call you

2 directly?

3 MR. DONSANTO: FBI.

4 MR. GREENBAUM: We did that twice in
5 2004. We had other instances we could have done
6 it. And the FBI, they did not want to 7 follow-up. We had the complainant.

8 MR. DONSANTO: Which field division?

9 MR. GREENBAUM: In Arizona, in 10 Florida. Florida, I think it was Palm Beach.

11 MR. DONSANTO: I'll tell you what
12 I'll do, I am not here to protest or intake
13 cases, but I write an awful FD 302.

14 MR. GREENBAUM: In Arizona --

15 MR. DONSANTO: If you can send me a 16 paragraph on these, I will send it to the 17 district election officer in that district and 18 ask what happened. I won't be able to tell you
19 what they responded to, but I will in fact
20 query. Because what I said is true, if we can 21 find out who does that sort of thing, I am eager 22 to.

89

1 MR. HEARNE: Craig, in your opinion,
2 someone making those kind of false statements,
3 is that within what you understand to be
4 intimidation?

5 MR. DONSANTO: If it occurs within a
6 federal election. That is the unique way the 7 laws were written about if it occurs in a
8 federal election, that sort of behavior is a
9 conspiracy to deprive the victim of their right

10 to vote for federal office.

11 MS. WANG: I have to say, in some of 12 the interviews, we have heard similar complaints
13 from the people from the advocacy organizations,
14 that they have sent reams of documentation to 15 the DOJ and not gotten a response.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: We did something to 17 Tanner or to Alex Costa. Alex called back and 18 said, "Talk to the FBI." With two of the 19 instances, we talked to the FBI, and it was 20 clear that they just had no intention of doing
21 anything with it. Frankly, it turned us off
22 after that.

90

1 MR. DONSANTO: In Arizona, I am not
2 entirely surprised, but that may be a personnel
3 problem. And it also may be a problem with 4 respect to how your facts fell insofar as the 5 law. It may be the fact that your facts did not
6 produce sufficient leads. These are all things.

7 MR. GREENBAUM: In one case we
8 actually had -- the person actually had the 9 number, because of caller ID and actually called 10 the number back, and someone answered the phone
11 and identified who they were affiliated with.

12 MR. DONSANTO: Right. This occurred
13 in the 2004 general election?

14 MR. GREENBAUM: Yes, it did.

15 MR. HEARNE: I can give you another
16 example that was presented to Congress, and it
17 was not followed up. That was a phone call to a

18 sitting retired Ohio judge in Marion County,
19 Ohio.

20 MR. DONSANTO: We did follow-up on 21 that one.

22 MR. SEREBROV: Yes. There was the 91

1 case I gave you.

2 MS. WANG: You might want to look at
3 the summaries of the interviews, because a
4 number of people have said they have given all
5 this information to the Department of Justice,
6 and they haven't done anything. I am just the 7 bearer of the news.

8 MR. DONSANTO: And the other thing
9 that bears in mind, we cannot prosecute
10 everything. We try to, based on the degree of 11 severity of the event and the need for 12 deterrence.

13 MR. HEARNE: Craig, not to belabor
14 the point but to make sure, in terms of the 15 intimidation, that I think it's very important
16 that we all understand, every election I ever
17 remember hearing about, we have these 18 allegations. And we always hear them and 19 everybody says, well, hey, no one did anything.
20 We're talking about calls to voters, like the 21 Tobin situation. We just talked about the other
22 situation, calls directed to voters trying to 92

1 give them misinformation.

2 what about calls to other people
Page 68

3 involved in the election, somebody calling and 4 saying, if you participate as an observer, as a
5 volunteer in an election, that we're going to 6 sue you for doing that, not voting, just
7 participating in the election process.

8 MR. DONSANTO: I'm not going to 9 comment on whether that's a crime or not.

10 That's probably more a statement of fact. The 11 underlying thing is that is communicated, it has 12 to be false. I understand why come people will 13 be appalled of the fact that you intend to put 14 poll observers in their precinct, and say want
15 to sue you.

16 MS. WANG: My understanding is you
17 don't think the way we have intimidation here is 18 comports with what the legal definition is.

19 MR. DONSANTO: I think out of the 20 exchange that I had, I think I have changed my 21 thinking a little bit. Can I run it out a
22 second time, see if it comes out better.

93

1 The word intimidate is a word of art
2 that connotes physical or economic duress in
3 terms of criminal behavior, okay.

4 The word suppression is a work in
5 progress. I can tell you it addresses denial of 6 services, actions directed at get-out-to-vote
7 drives. I can tell you it is directed at 8 situations where maliciously false information
9 is communicated to voters to prevent them from 10 voting in election federal elections. change

11 poll places, hiding the poll place, that's an 12 old type of thing.

13 So the point is the extent to which 14 the word suppression can be translated into 15 crime is a work in progress, with certain
16 aspects of it that I have just summarized here
17 being clearly within the definition but not 18 necessarily having those being exclusive.

19 MS. WANG: So is there some 20 particular language that you might suggest?

21 MR. DONSANTO: I think the word
22 corruptly.

94

1 MS. SIMS: So the fifth bullet from
2 the bottom.

3 MR. DONSANTO: Intimidating practices
4 involving the use of economic, physical duress
5 to prevent or deter voting activity, and then a
6 separate bullet having to do with suppression,
7 corrupt activities or activities aimed at 8 corruptly suppressing. Corruptly with a word
9 that connotes specific intent. It's kind of 10 like you know it when you see it.

11 MS. WANG: Are we limited to the 12 Department of Justice definition of
13 intimidation?

14 MR. DONSANTO: You can do anything
15 that you want to do.

16 MS. WANG: Because I would rather not 17 have it be limited to economic or physical 18 deprivation.

19 MR. DONSANTO: This is what I am
20 trying to avoid, is that there are some things
21 that happen in the political process that aren't
22 pleasant, and the rent-a-cop scenario is one of 95

1 those, the poll watcher who aggressively pursues
2 his mandate and poll watches.

3 MS. WANG: That's what I'm talking
4 about.

5 MR. DONSANTO: That's not a crime
6 Fraud is a word that connotes crime.

7 MR. GINSBERG: You can't tune your
8 definitions to create a political resolve,
9 unless you want to make a political statement,
10 which is fine, but then let's label it that way.
11 And I hope that if you're going to manufacture a
12 definition like that, you would have precise 13 examples of what you're trying to bring in to 14 this new term you're coming up with.

15 MR. GREENBAUM: Sure. In terms of 16 this type of intimidation, actually the example
17 that Craig gave, the over aggressive poll
18 watcher, there are cases out there where those 19 poll watchers have been thrown out, not 20 necessarily because they committed a crime, but 21 they may have violated a statute.

22 MR. DONSANTO: And that is the 96

1 appropriate remedy for that kind of offense.

2 MR. GREENBAUM: But that's part of

3 intimidation though.

4 MR. GINSBERG: Poll watchers who are
5 being more aggressive than the local people in 6 the polls think that should be intimidating, and 7 that the poll watcher should leave.

8 Where does that fit into your definition?

9 Let's deal with that example.

10 MR. BAUER: Well, I want to go to 11 something you earlier said, which is, we 12 shouldn't be concerned with anything that isn't 13 criminal, that couldn't be established to be 14 criminal. Well, you just said -- Craig said
15 they are -- it is a work in progress to begin
16 with. That is not a boundary that is easily set
17 here.

18 And the second thing, I don't believe
19 that the EAC should announce that it's only 20 dealing with criminal forms of illegal conduct.

21 MR. GINSBERG: You can't stretch
22 definitions to achieve a political result here.

97

1 I was referring to the way she was trying to
2 change it.

3 MS. ROGERS: Does the definition
4 include conspiring to do any of these?

5 MS. WANG: That can certainly be
6 added.

7 MR. HEARNE: Let me ask a question.
8 When you use the word intimidation, a lot of 9 people have come to me in different contexts and 10 say, "I find it intimidating when I go in and

11 people with signs are sticking something in 12 front of me."

13 MS. WANG: well, how did you make the 14 distinction in the report that you wrote?

15 MR. HEARNE: well, the report would 16 be somebody trying to prevent somebody from 17 exercising their right. That's a component
18 point. You work into it.

19 MS. WANG: Intimidating practices.

20 MR. HEARNE: I want to bring out the 21 point, it is not just a perception that some 22 hypothetical voter found it intimidating to go

98

1 through the process, but it was intended by the
2 person engaging in that act to deny that person
3 their right to participate in the election.

4 MS. WANG: I had specifically wanted
5 and I guess there had been some objection to 6 having violations of the Voting Rights Act part 7 of this definition, but I think Craig said what
8 was the problem. I think there are some Section
9 2 violations and there was an objection to that.

10 MR. DONSANTO: The problem that I've
11 got with their definition is that the word fraud
12 appears in the labelling definition, and I don't 13 know what the Congress meant when it put that 14 word in there.

15 I have been a prosecutor my whole
16 life. To me, fraud is a crime. There is no
17 such thing to me. Fraud connotes, yes, there is 18 civil fraud, but civil fraud, I have always been

19 a believer in the fact that most civil frauds
20 could be criminal fraud. Fraud is obtaining 21 property from another through lying.

22 MS. WANG: Defining elect fraud and 99

1 defining voter intimidation.

2 MR. GINSBERG: Let me go back to my
3 hypothetical. Does the definition of a poll
4 watcher in an unfriendly precinct, who gets 5 intimidated, who goes about his duties under the 6 statute to challenge voters that he or she 7 thinks may be improper, and is intimidated out of 8 that polling place from doing the poll watcher's
9 job, does that fit in your definition?

10 MS. WANG: Well, that goes back to 11 the problem of where do you draw the line
12 between allegations and something that would 13 indicate that there was some merit to it, some 14 sort of investigation or official action, which 15 is a problem that you have in all of these 16 examples, so I can't say this is where you draw
17 the line in this particular instance the same
18 way. I'm not sure how you draw the line when 19 someone alleges that a felon has voted and they 20 should be prosecuted and thrown in jail and it
21 is the case that they did not know where they 22 were not allowed to vote. There is line drawing 100

1 that has to be done that isn't easy.

2 MR. DONSANTO: Couldn't you possibly
3 address this by putting before the preface

Transcript 051806

4 something to the effect that the definition that 5 we're providing here is a definition that we're 6 going to be using to define the scope of this
7 project? Most of the activities described here
8 are crimes, but that is not necessarily the case
9 with all of them.

10 MS. WANG: I'm fine with that.

11 MR. DON SANTO: Something like that.

12 MR. HEARNE: Tova, let me make sure
13 your point is one that I agree with, is to say
14 let's look at we're not saying somebody finds it
15 intimidating, but something intimidating enough
16 to prevent somebody lawfully participating in 17 the election process. Do we include just the 18 voter or other people, volunteers, people
19 participating, people driving them to the poll?
20 If somebody wants to drive somebody to the polls
21 and slashes their tires, does that count as a
22 suppression or intimidation?

101

1 MS. WANG: Well, you know, we had
2 that case already.

3 MR. HEARNE: When we look at that
4 definition, what are we looking at?

5 MS. WANG: Well, they are in jail
6 now.

7 MR. DON SANTO: That's a Wisconsin
8 case.

9 MR. GINSBERG: What's the distinction
10 between that case and the phone case?

11 MR. DON SANTO: None. We wanted both
Page 75

Transcript 051806

12 of them. We were prepared to take both of them,
13 but we only had enough resources to pursue one,
14 and the District Attorney in Milwaukee agreed to 15 take operation elephant flat foot. That's what 16 it was called. The name of it was called 17 elephant flat foot. Instead of jamming the 18 phone lines of the get-out-to-vote drive, they 19 took the vans that were going to be used to 20 deliver voters to the polls and wrecked them.

21 MR. GINSBERG: Is that intimidation?

22 MS. WANG: It probably doesn't count
102

1 because it does distort the ability to vote, so
2 I would guess so.

3 MR. SEREBROV: Well, it's an
4 intentional action, so it's included.

5 MR. DONSANTO: There is corrupt voter
6 suppression, and those guys are all in jail.

7 MR. GINSBERG: And you don't have the 8 federal precedent.

9 MR. DONSANTO: The same thing, the
10 object of the scheme was to deprive the victim
11 of their right to vote in a federal election,
12 the right to vote for federal office. That was 13 the object of it, same way as at the poll.

14 MS. WANG: Are there other comments
15 or suggestions to the definition that we have,
16 other than Craig's?

17 Is this a good time to take a break?

18 MS. SIMS: I wanted to mention that 19 Secretary Todd Rokita had asked about

20 legislative history in connection with these two 21 things. I had done some initial research and 22 hadn't found it to be helpful. As I recall to a
103

1 certain extent, these were, I believe,
2 amendments added on the floor of the House, and
3 I don't know there was a lot of discussion
4 associated with them.

5 MR. ROKITA: Was there any?

6 MS. SIMS: Other than I knew that the 7 voter intimidation was a direct reaction to the 8 voting fraud amendment. What a surprise. That 9 was pretty clear, but there wasn't a lot in here
10 that I could see. The meat of this bill, the 11 discussions took place outside of public venue.

12 MR. ROKITA: If there is some way we 13 can run a quick search on 241 and print off some 14 legislative history.

15 MR. DONSANTO: 241 was enacted in 16 1886.

17 MR. ROKITA: Help America Vote Act.

18 MS. SIMS: We have a volunteer ready
19 to do that, but it may be a good time to do a 20 break.

21 MR. HEARNE: Before we conclude that 22 point, my sense was, is somebody going to 104

1 re-work it, are we going to break it into two?

2 MS. WANG: We're going to put this
3 little preface. She got all this down.

4 MR. HEARNE: Is that transcript going
5 to be available to us?

6 MS. SIMS: We can make it available
7 to you, probably 15 days.

8 (Short Recess.)

9 MS. SIMS: As you notice, we have
10 been joined by Paul DeGregorio and our Executive 11 Director, Tom Wilkey, and Julie Thompson
12 Hodgkins.

13 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: Let me, first
14 of all, thank you on behalf of the Commission
15 for coming today and participating in this 16 important working group. We know that Job and 17 Tova have worked for many months now on this 18 project, and some of you together, to discuss
19 this important issue of voter fraud and voter 20 intimidation that is required under HAVA for the 21 EAC to take a look at. And we have taken our 22 role very seriously to do, and believe they have

□ 105

1 brought together some of the best people in the 2 country to take a look at these issues and to
3 come forth with some ideas for the EAC.

4 Vice-Chairman Martinez wanted to be
5 with us today, but his father is fairly sick in 6 Austin, so he had to fly back yesterday evening
7 to be with his father and so he couldn't be
8 here, but I've asked our executive director, Tom
9 Wilkey, raise your hand, and our legal counsel,
10 Julie Hodgkins, to join us this afternoon.

11 I know that you all have had some

12 discussions already and we're really just going
13 to listen, not to participate, because we know
14 you are at the point where you're going to be 15 talking about some recommendations and talking 16 about some things that you want to direct to the 17 EAC.

18 so we thought it would be important
19 just for us to sit back and to listen to the 20 discussion so it can help us, as the consultant,
21 to then move forward with recommendations to us
22 in future months. Thank you, again, for 106

1 participating. I don't know if you're going to
2 have future working groups of this group, but 3 certainly --

4 MS. SIMS: Not for this phase, but if
5 we have subsequent research, I'm sure that we'll 6 need working groups to help us with that.

7 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: Peggy Sims and
8 I go back twenty years when I was the director
9 of elections in St. Louis County, and Thor was 10 pretty young and maybe still in law school. I 11 remember those days. I used to call Peggy when 12 she worked for the Federal Election Commission
13 in Franklin. Donsanto also goes back many, many 14 years to IACREAT seminars when I used to hear
15 him talk about voter fraud issues throughout the 16 country. We have got some other people in our 17 own staff who are participating in helping this 18 along. Thank you, Peggy, for your work. I will 19 let you go ahead and continue.

20 MS. SIMS: Okay. I just wanted to 21 say as we get into ideas, because remember,
22 we're not just talking about statistics, we're

107

1 talking about identifying, deterring, and
2 investigating voter fraud and voter
3 intimidation. Some of that, in my mind, and 4 this is, again, from my experience at FEC, will
5 involve the process and how election officials
6 run the process.

7 We're also working on management
8 guidelines for voting systems. As you may know,
9 the EAC recently released its voluntary voting
10 system guidelines which are used to test voting
11 equipment. Now, we're also focusing -- we're 12 also working on updating those guidelines. That 13 is going to be a constant process, but the 14 companion piece, one that I know Tom Wilkey has 15 urged us to do for a long time, is to develop 16 management guidelines for the management of 17 these voting systems. We're working on that 18 right now.

19 Also, we have a project looking at 20 state vote counting and recounting laws in 21 contested elections. And the effort will also 22 pick up best practices that apply to these

108

1 areas.

2 We also have a report that is being
3 -- I guess it is still in the draft stage for 4 provisional voting, and one on voter ID that

Transcript 051806

5 might relate to some of these problems that we 6 saw, that may actually relate more to how the 7 process is administered rather than actual
8 voting fraud. But if these processes are 9 administered badly, they can leave open the 10 opportunity for voting fraud.

11 So I wanted to make sure you had that 12 information available before we got into this 13 discussion.

14 MS. WANG: Okay. Well, as I kept
15 referring to earlier, I did talk to a bunch of 16 political scientists and other expert types in 17 the field. You have in your materials sort of 18 summaries of the recommendations that they made.
19 As I said, if ever there was something everyone
20 agreed to, this would be a complex undertaking.
21 I am not a political scientist so I am sort of 22 reluctant to myself recommend any one of these

109

1 methodologies over another, which is why I think
2 in Phase 2 it will be necessary to have someone
3 of the nature of the people I interviewed
4 involved in the process, someone who really
5 knows how to do statistical work and do these 6 kind of studies. And there are people out there
7 like that, and I can make some recommendations
8 in that regard.

9 I would note that several of the 10 recommended methodologies, sort of a
11 multi-pronged approach we were getting at 12 earlier, many of them include the elements of 13 conducting more interviews, doing a survey,

14 which I know brings up issues for the EAC, but 15 doing a survey of voters or administrators or 16 both, and finally, analyzing and doing voting
17 list comparisons.

18 So I'm happy to talk further about
19 any of the particular methodologies that were 20 suggested to me but I think I don't feel that I
21 am necessarily in the position to judge which of 22 these is best, and I would be open to any

110

1 thoughts you have as to what seemed like they
2 make the most sense.

3 MS. SIMS: The difficulties we have
4 with surveys is because this agency, unlike FEC,
5 is under the Paperwork Reduction Act
6 requirement, which means we have to go through a
7 process which Julie could tell you, if you need
8 to know. But what it does is delays our ability
9 to be able to do surveys quickly because we have 10 to go through this process before we're allowed
11 to conduct surveys.

12 MR. DONSANTO: Paperwork Reduction
13 Act requires you to --

14 MS. SIMS: Make paperwork, yes. The 15 only reason why I bring that up then is if we're
16 going to have surveys as part of a research
17 process, we have to build in time to be able to 18 go through this process to get our surveys
19 approved and ready to go.

20 I know people were already talking

21 about some ideas earlier. I will just go ahead
22 and put them up. I know we had a discussion

111

1 about observers, using observers or poll
2 watchers. I'm not making any judgements on the 3 cost of these or our ability to do this. I just 4 want to make sure we put up our ideas.

5 MR. CORTES: In terms of that, could
6 we define when we're talking about observers,
7 what those people actually do in the polling
8 place? I think there's different states have 9 allowed different types of access to people and 10 what they can do there. I believe you mentioned
11 earlier that in Virginia there aren't observers
12 allowed, but they do have people in the parties
13 in there that keep track of who comes into the 14 polling place.

15 So in terms of making those
16 distinctions, if we could get some definitions
17 for these, I think it would be helpful.

18 MS. SIMS: Would we be able to do the 19 definitions or would these be defined by the 20 states?

21 MR. SEREBROV: Part of our suggestion
22 was a survey state wise.

112

1 MR. HEARNE: In terms of what I think
2 Ben was suggesting, I think Barry had a concept.
3 What you were talking about, Barry, was sort of 4 the rigorous questionnaire kind of thing that is

5 a uniform observation form that observers were 6 given, with very quantifiable data, that they go
7 in and observe the conduct of the election and 8 report anything based on that sort of standard.
9 That is what you're conceiving. So somebody
10 would say, how many people are registered to 11 vote here, how many machines are in this polling
12 place, how long a wait, how many people came 13 through the line, check off those objective
14 factors, is that what you're thinking of?

15 MR. WEINBERG: Right, whatever else,
16 comments observers want to make on the forms.

17 MR. GREENBAUM: At this point, we're
18 just putting ideas on the table. We're not 19 discussing how we feel about them.

20 MS. SIMS: That's correct. We know
21 we don't have universal support.

22 MS. ROGERS: On the subject of 113

1 observers, there seems to be two prongs; one,
2 observers used in the collection of data, but
3 two, observers used as a methodology in 4 deterring fraud, which seems to me to be two
5 different uses of observers, and I wanted to 6 record that.

7 MS. WANG: Let's just talk about the 8 methodology first because I have a list of 9 things that we should do going forward.

10 I am focusing on the methodologies first.

11 what do you all think about doing a
12 survey?

13 MR. DONSANTO: Survey of what?
14 MS. WANG: Well, you could do it a
15 couple different ways. Some of them actually 16 are described here.
17 MR. BAUER: Voter surveys?
18 MS. WANG: Voter surveys, what did
19 you experience at the poll.
20 MR. DONSANTO: Who are the people
21 that would get the survey?
22 MS. WANG: Well, it would be to have

114

1 some sort of random survey that a political
2 scientist would know how to devise.
3 The other thing is having observers
4 who either survey voters as they come out of the 5 poll.

6 MR. WEINBERG: But is this a survey
7 to determine fraud or to determine what happened
8 in the poll? What's to come out of this, what 9 is the survey supposed to tell us?

10 MS. WANG: Whether the person
11 participated in -- or who knows how much they 12 will self report, or observed some kind of 13 practice, fraud, or intimidation practice.

14 MR. BAUER: Is this based on the 15 Overton?

16 MS. WANG: Several of the experts
17 interviewed that I spoke to suggested a survey.
18 There was also a suggestion of a more massive 19 survey of administrators that would be much more
20 comprehensive than just trying to do interviews

21 of these people.

22 MR. GINSBERG: How many voters were 115

1 they willing to --

2 MS. WANG: No one was willing to come
3 up with a number. They just said it would have 4 to be big.

5 MR. DONSANTO: It would have to be 6 huge.

7 MS. SIMS: When they referenced
8 election officials, they were talking about
9 local and state election officials.

10 MS. WANG: Well, at this point, local 11 because the state election officials have been 12 easy to have conversations with.

13 MR. BAUER: There is one kind of 14 survey intended to determine whether or not the 15 voters we talked to who say they were registered
16 were, in fact, registered. As Overton
17 described, this is a statistically
18 representative sample of people who purported to 19 report how they voted. And the other one,
20 somewhere, you are basically converting them
21 into eyewitnesses.

22 There are very different kinds of surveys for 116

1 very different purposes.

2 MR. GINSBERG: Did you commit fraud
3 at the polling place?

4 MR. BAUER: Trying to transcend the
5 anecdotal nature of what we do about frauds, it
Page 86

Transcript 051806

6 seems to me -- I am not an expert on polling
7 methodology, but the potential for
8 interpretation of an awful lot of data collected
9 for marginal potential value, it doesn't tell
10 you very much.

11 MR. GREENBAUM: Let me agree with 12 Bob.

13 MS. WANG: Just for the record.

14 MR. WEINBERG: I think a better
15 question would be whether anybody thinks the 16 survey would be useful.

17 MR. DONSANTO: It is for the 18 practical. It might be useful. It is just not 19 practical.

20 MR. GREENBAUM: Except to the extent
21 I am aware of all the things we have on there.
22 How do we capture where most of the fraud's

117

1 taking place, which is not in the polls.

2 MR. DONSANTO: Right.

3 MR. GREENBAUM: For the initial, I
4 will state that it's my opinion.

5 MR. GINSBERG: But come up with a
6 list about where you think the fraud is being
7 committed, see if you can come up with a
8 methodology.

9 MS. WANG: There was this bunch of 10 people who independently came up with the idea
11 of picking ten places where you know there have 12 been a lot of problems, and some people where 13 there haven't, make them match geographically,

14 demographically, and try to see where the 15 differences are.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: It's tricky. I know
17 this in terms of some of the stuff I have done,
18 but sometimes you think that places are doing
19 better than they really are, and sometimes you
20 think that places are doing worse.

21 MR. HEARNE: Let me suggest an
22 objective criteria that you might get in the 118

1 first gathering. In Ohio, a lot of allegations
2 were made that voters were intimidated or
3 suppressed, the voter buys, taking older ones
4 and not putting them in others. There was a
5 U.S. House administration hearing, and officials
6 in charge said, no, we had quality distribution
7 based on number of voters. The lines were long
8 in certain areas, as they were in others.

9 MS. WANG: We don't want to get into 10 that particular example.

11 MR. HEARNE: That's the kind of 12 objective observation to be quantified. If you
13 had an observer in the polling place that would 14 be -- ben had suggested a Republican and 15 Democrat in interest. If you had an appropriate
16 sampling of why it was taking this long to vote
17 in this precinct, this long in this precinct.

18 MR. GREENBAUM: That's not even a 19 fraud issue, I mean, not in my mind. And 20 believe me, we have studied the Ohio elections
21 administration very closely, given that we sued

22 the Secretary of State. That goes more to 119

1 election administration as opposed to a fraud
2 issue.

3 MR. ROKITA: So it doesn't fit under
4 your definition of fraud.

5 MS. WANG: It depends on whether 6 there was some reason to believe it was 7 intention, in my personal opinion.

8 MR. GREENBAUM: well, the problem in
9 Franklin, Ohio, was determined how the machines
10 were going to be allocated.

11 MR. HEARNE: Let me take that as an
12 example. That is something that undermines a 13 lot of people's confidence in the election
14 process, when somebody is going into the process
15 and saying, we're only going to put one polling
16 machine for every thousand people in this
17 polling place, and fifty of them for 500 people
18 out here. That would be the kind of thing you
19 can quantify. You can find out directly what is 20 the data, what you think you can do that now.
21 We know that now.

22 MR. HEARNE: And that would be

120

1 helpful.

2 MS. SIMS: Maybe the question is how
3 do we find out about that now. Right now, we 4 find out through --

5 MR. ROKITA: The states and the

6 counties.

7 MS. SIMS: The states and the
8 counties, and also calls made to the justice
9 department.

10 MR. HEARNE: Or about the lines. You
11 always get this allegation about long lines.
12 Every voter is going to come out with a 13 different perception, and you're always going to 14 have these competing stories about long lines in 15 different areas. If you had some teams in there
16 watching this and timing it, you would get some 17 objective criteria to evaluate those 18 allegations.

19 MR. GREENBAUM: From my point of 20 view, why would you want a Republican and 21 Democrat, why won't you want a college student
22 or someone else that people can agree doesn't go
121

1 in there with any sort of biases?

2 MR. SEREBROV: You can't necessarily
3 get a college student in the polls.

4 MR. GREENBAUM: Right. The state
5 laws are an impediment in a lot of places.

6 MS. SIMS: Well, some of these
7 things, like the machine placement, that's just 8 an example. A lot of things I personally see in 9 the press before I see anywhere else. That gets 10 to your following up on some of the press
11 reports to find out whether or not something
12 really happened, but that again is not a hundred
13 percent reliable because we're only getting a

14 bit of the picture. And if you follow-up on 15 those press reports, we may find out that an 16 allegation of fraud was not fraud at all, it was 17 a mistake.

18 MS. WANG: Well, that's the case. I
19 don't know if we can come up with a methodology
20 in here. None of us are political scientists at 21 all either. So I just put these in front of you
22 as the types of things that people came up with.

122

1 I think, as we have talked about, it
2 is going to be a combination of approaches which
3 the work that we have already done will be one
4 of those ingredients supplemented by something
5 that political scientists would do.

6 we can get some more ideas flowing.
7 Job and I talked about what we have thought
8 about as being additional steps that could be 9 taken. They are not methodologies but things
10 that we think still need to be done, even just 11 based on what we have already done. Should we 12 move into that or stay on this?

13 MS. SIMS: We can certainly go on
14 because we can come back to this too. One thing
15 I would like to ask folks to consider again,
16 even though we don't have complete data because 17 this is a preliminary study, we do know of areas
18 in the process itself that are more subject to 19 attacks by voting fraud and are the studies EAC
20 can do in those areas.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: Absentee.

1 about absentee ballot. We have talked about
2 observers in the polling place, but the
3 empirical data shows it is absentee balloting
4 fraud, we're poised to see a tremendous amount
5 of that grow.

6 Example, in Georgia, that's happening all
7 over the nation which is now a no-excuse by mail
8 absentee state. In addition to that, it was 9 stuck in our law, it was a caveat that said that 10 political parties could not attach campaign
11 material to an absentee ballot application.
12 That was taken out. It was also ruled that a 13 postage stamp is not a thing of value. So if 14 you put all of those together, we're going to 15 see both parties flooding mail ballots with 16 absentee ballot applications.

17 MS. WANG: Sarah Ball Johnson, who is 18 in charge of elections in Kentucky, we
19 interviewed, talked about the churches gathering
20 people together to collectively fill out their 21 absentee ballot, and being told if they don't 22 vote in a certain way, they were going to hell.

1 MR. DONSANTO: That's probably true.

2 MR. ROKITA: There is an example of 3 something you can follow-up on.

4 MS. ROGERS: We have already seen a
5 huge increase in -- I won't say fraud, but in 6 complaints. This law was in place last year and

Transcript 051806

7 we only had municipal elections in November.
8 Not everyone has really wised up to this but a
9 few candidates did, and there was one particular 10 election in Richmond County where going into the 11 run off, the winner was clearly ahead by a lot
12 of votes, and the losing candidate that was 13 down, before he went to the run off, he found
14 out about this little caveat, and he went
15 knocking on every door with an absentee ballot
16 application, and by George, he won, and won big.
17 That's the area.

18 And the problem is that you're trying
19 not to make it harder on those who are disabled.
20 At the same time, you don't want to keep adding
21 levels and layers of security that prevents them
22 from getting the access that they need, but as

125

1 you take away those levels of security, it
2 follows on the other side as well. I know we
3 haven't really addressed that, but observers
4 don't take care of that process.

5 MR. HEARNE: You mentioned something
6 that might be helpful in the sense of,
7 statistically, you can look at an election and 8 you can find results that you can look at and 9 say, this doesn't make any sense, how you would 10 get this kind of vote performance out of a
11 particular vocational place or group of absentee
12 ballots.

13 MS. ROGERS: Well, some of the cases
14 we have looked at, they said, look at these

Transcript 051806

15 numbers, they don't look good to us. We go in 16 and look at them, and what we find is one
17 candidate pounded the pavement with the absentee 18 ballots maybe didn't commit fraud literally. In 19 Georgia, the candidate did fill out the top part
20 of the form. You can check the box and say I
21 don't need excuse, and you can sign it.

22 MR. DONSANTO: Voter has to sign it.

126

1 You can pre print them.

2 MR. HEARNE: You can pre print it
3 with the vote on it.

4 MR. DONSANTO: No, the application.
5 That was a big thing in Florida. Both parties
6 pre printed applications for absentee ballots
7 and mailed them.

8 MS. ROGERS: And one of the biggest 9 problems we see is the fraud is not occurring at 10 the federal candidates. DOJ is not as 11 interested in this.

12 MS. WANG: Well, actually, that is 13 not true.

14 MR. DONSANTO: That's not necessarily 15 the case.

16 MS. ROGERS: I'm not saying you are 17 not interesting.

18 MR. DONSANTO: If it happens in a
19 non-federal election, we don't have the statutes
20 to do anything about it.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: It doesn't have to be
22 a federal candidate.

1 MS. WANG: From the news articles,
2 this is the one type of fraud that is more often
3 investigated, and there are indictments, and
4 prosecutions, and convictions, and guilty pleas,
5 and stuff.

6 So you actually can take a look at 7 actual cases to see how it's being done, and try
8 and come up with better measures to prevent it
9 and catch it. You have Oregon, and they claim 10 that they have no problem. That is disputed on 11 a lot of levels but the one thing we can't know
12 about Oregon is the extent of which the coercion
13 problem happens.

14 MR. ROKITA: You can't know?

15 MS. WANG: Right.

16 MR. DONSANTO: Public voting, every
17 ballot, public vote.

18 MS. ROGERS: Unfortunately, it takes 19 so long to bring these cases to a resolution, we 20 find, time after time, by the time the case goes
21 to an actual court, a lot of these folks no
22 longer tell the same story. A year or two goes

128

1 by, and those people who were coerced, they are
2 just not saying that anymore. They change their
3 tune, and then again, many of them are very old
4 and very elderly, and not a hundred percent have
5 all their faculties to begin with, so two years
6 makes a huge difference.

7 I think we see a lot of cases closed
8 simply because you are unable to have the data
9 that you need to follow through.

10 MR. ROKITA: Maybe the EAC should 11 study the methodology of for cause absentee
12 voting as a way to cure it.

13 MS. WANG: That is where you wind up
14 against the politics of it, which seems like a 15 train that's left the station.

16 MR. HEARNE: Your point, if I
17 understand, was in looking at the data where you
18 did find broader, documented evidence of fraud
19 was in the concept of absentee ballots, is that 20 correct?

21 MS. WANG: Yes.

22 MR. HEARNE: So the sense would be is 129

1 there a way to study it. And the question for
2 us now is, how do we study that phenomenon.

3 MS. WANG: Given that it's something
4 that is spreading rapidly, are there measures we
5 can come up with to make the ballots more
6 secure. The coercion issue is difficult to get 7 at, but in terms of the forgeries and those 8 types of things, and even actually with the 9 coercion, are there measures that can be taken
10 to make absentee ballots and mail-in ballots
11 more secure?

12 MR. BAUER: One thing I want to go
13 to, what we were just discussing, some of the 14 recommendations.

15 MS. WANG: Bob, you raised your
16 point.

17 MR. BAUER: One of the interesting
18 proposals or suggestions made by the 19 interviewees, his name is Weisner.

20 MS. WANG: Weisner. Wendy Weisner.

21 MR. BAUER: We though that
22 establishing any degree of concreteness on voter
□ 130

1 fraud would be difficult to establish. We
2 suggest that an effort be made to simply -- I am
3 not quite sure exactly what the methodology name
4 is.

5 MS. WANG: Risk analysis.

6 MR. BAUER: Risk analysis, and
7 determine based on the assumption that people
8 act rationally in this area, what we would most 9 expect to see, what kinds of fraud is most
10 potentially likely, and then just rank it. You
11 are not making a judgement there at that point
12 that's, in fact, what is happening. It is just 13 a very interesting way of trying to sort of 14 order your thoughts about what you might be 15 looking for, and it can be marked up with other
16 numbers to bolster their significance.

17 MR. GINSBERG: How could you figure
18 out how you do the risk analysis.

19 MR. BAUER: I don't know, and I don't
20 have any expertise.

21 MS. WANG: I started to get books on 22 risk analysis but I didn't want to read about
□ 131

1 the diseases and environmental calamities.

2 MR. BAUER: Just from a standpoint of 3 debate, what we had in perspective, we find
4 using it to help ask questions was something
5 concrete you can do. I don't think it's a bad
6 thing to do. It is affirmatively a good thing.

7 MR. WEINBERG: I thought that was
8 interesting, although I didn't understand what 9 it said.

10 MR. PEREZ: You're a county clerk,
11 and you are in the ballot. You have got 12 something to gain right away. If you're not on 13 the ballot and you don't work for somebody on 14 the ballot, where is the risk analysis involved,
15 the direct relationship?

16 MS. WANG: Let me try to explain it
17 from the little I understand about it. You
18 take, for example, in the environmental field,
19 if a corporation is trying to decide what 20 measures to takes, how much is that worth, how 21 likely is it that some bad outcome is going to 22 happen versus the cost of preventing it. So you

□ 132

1 would sort of do a cost benefit analysis of each
2 type of voter fraud that we have listed. So
3 what's the risk of filling out a fraudulent
4 absentee ballot versus the risk of getting
5 caught, or the penalty involved, the cost
6 involved of doing so.

7 And by going through that method,

8 determining what are the types of fraud that are 9 most likely to be committed, because as Bob
10 says, people are presumed to be rational actors
11 and to engage in those types of activities that 12 they think they can get away it.

13 MR. PEREZ: You're talking about the 14 actual voter. I'm talking about the actual 15 groups trying to get something passed.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: It could be either.
17 You could do it at the level of the voter or the 18 level of an organization.

19 MR. PEREZ: The voter is going to be 20 intimidated, but the organization has an agenda.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: But I think some 22 people here would say that a portion of the 133

1 fraud is being committed by individual voters,
2 without necessarily being part of a greater
3 agenda. I think you would have to analyze it
4 both ways.

5 MR. SEREBROV: We found very little
6 though.

7 MS. WANG: There is only very little
8 who found there was anything conspiratorial
9 going on, one which was actually theories that 10 indicated that there was anything conspiratorial
11 happening.

12 MR. BAUER: A cross the board?

13 MS. WANG: Right. The ACVR report
14 allude to some coordination of voter
15 registration fraud among some of the voter

Transcript 051806

16 registration groups.

17 MR. SEREBROV: What was stated was 18 groups versus individual. That's what I was 19 saying, was we found very little individual
20 activity as opposed to organizational activity.

21 MR. BAUER: I'm sorry. Just so we
22 can define these terms, and I apologize, very 134

1 little individual voters committing fraud.

2 MR. BAUER: Just because they wanted
3 to.

4 MS. WANG: Well, actually, in the
5 articles, you do find individuals on the 6 absentee vote just submitting an absentee ballot
7 in the name of somebody else or in the name of 8 somebody who died.

9 MR. GREENBAUM: Like some of the 10 stuff in Texas.

11 MR. DONSANTO: Somebody committing
12 voter fraud is not going to make as big a splash
13 in the newspaper as some organization.

14 MR. HEARNE: Some organization that 15 is paying somebody to do something that they 16 know is fraudulent, then that's different than 17 the individual engaging in that activity.

18 So if somebody is paying for fraudulently
19 submitted voter registration forms and they 20 understand those are fraudulent, that would be 21 then that type of activity.

22 MR. DONSANTO: Paying for piece work 135

1 and getting fraudulent documents, but that is
2 not the intent.

3 MR. GREENBAUM: I would say another
4 thing you want to measure in terms of doing a
5 risk analysis is the conditions of the elections
6 in which it tends to happen.

7 MS. WANG: Right.

8 MR. GREENBAUM: Like I think a lot of 9 people believe that voter fraud, no matter who 10 it's committed by, tends to happen most often
11 when you have very competitive elections.
12 Because people, the winner -- the fraud may 13 actually make a difference in terms of who wins
14 or who loses the election.

15 MR. ROKITA: I'd like to follow-up on 16 that to say that this risk analysis, I think,
17 might fit very well in a corporation that was 18 trying to figure out what jobs they were having 19 people do, to see if OSHA would be violated or 20 something like that. When you pour on top of 21 that the serum like you're saying of any
22 election that has its emotions in candidates'

136

1 political parties tied to it, I think that risk
2 analysis is less useful.

3 MS. WANG: We can't presume people
4 are rational.

5 MR. HEARNE: With elections.

6 MR. ROKITA: And, too, you want to be
7 careful of the impression you leave. If you're

8 doing a risk analysis, you are weighing, and 9 that's something that might be acceptable.

10 MS. WANG: No, not acceptable, you
11 look for ways to address it. It's a more
12 practical way of getting at solutions rather 13 than trying to gauge with a number.

14 MR. ROKITA: You said a ranking.

15 MS. WANG: Not more important,
16 easier.

17 MR. SEREBROV: Todd, can't we presume
18 that they act rationally as to the means, not 19 necessarily the motive?

20 MS. WANG: I mean, people don't want
21 to go to jail.

22 MR. BAUER: I think the public

137

1 presents itself with amalgamation, but when
2 people try to win elections, targeting, I think
3 it's all about going to great length. I think,
4 in close analysis, I don't think at the end of
5 the day you're quite right, it has the same
6 application here as it might in other field but 7 I think it might be illuminated.

8 MS. WANG: We could get someone who
9 is actually an expert in risk analysis here
10 rather than someone who is a political scientist
11 who focuses on elections. That would give an 12 even better neutrality color to it.

13 MR. PEREZ: If you're trying to find
14 out a point where you want to review who is 15 going to be doing something, the only instances

16 I have with this has been in early voting where 17 they used the mail ballot in a particular
18 instance, where trying to get a particular 19 candidate or pass something that is going to 20 avoid money. When they do the particular issue,
21 some company's going to come into town and gain
22 a big contract. That's when I have seen the 138

1 mail ballot application trying to be defrauded
2 because they are trying to pass a particular
3 issue that was very obvious to us before we went 4 into it. What he did was tried to make sure we 5 did not let them do anything illegal. They
6 tried to put people in the polls. We ran them
7 out. They tried to put applications in. We
8 looked at the applications, the same
9 handwriting, anything that we could gauge.
10 Luckily, we have a lot better laws in terms of 11 what applications we have to take. We have gone
12 through with two years legislation to improve 13 the mail application process, and we have almost 14 got it down.

15 MS. ROGERS: It still can change.

16 MR. BAUER: Do you think you see more
17 fraud for initiative elections?

18 MS. WANG: You're talking about
19 money.

20 MR. PEREZ: It's like a business, who 21 is going to get money and how much money are 22 they going to get. Nobody can come to me and 139

Transcript 051806

1 say, hey, Jerry, are you going to throw that
2 election. I'm not going to get any money, why
3 should I care who gets elected.

4 MS. WANG: The conditions under which
5 somebody is trying to get elected. It's also 6 the smaller elections.

7 MR. PEREZ: Where you can throw it
8 much easier.

9 MR. GINSBERG: But you can have 10 people paying people to register where the 11 stakes are higher, and therefore, have an higher
12 incidence of false registrations.

13 MR. PEREZ: The risk analysis is it
14 costs too much money, whereas if you have a
15 small election, you can spend $10,000 and throw
16 the election, whereas on a national election, it
17 would cost.

18 MS. ROGERS: The people who are doing
19 this to be paid are simply taking a phone book
20 or making up names and making up -- used to be 21 able to collect social security numbers, making
22 up social security numbers. They didn't do it

140

1 for the purpose of trying to defraud the
2 election. They did it for the purpose of 3 putting money in their pocket.

4 MR. GINSBERG: Isn't that also the
5 incubator where you get false voters coming in?

6 MR. DONSANTO: No, no. I haven't
7 seen it.

8 MR. HEARNE: One situation we had a

012483

9 tandem effort where there was a petition for a 10 recall. They were trying a recall petition but 11 to do that you had to be a registered voter.
12 They were forcing the recall petition as well as 13 turning in the registration. This was, in 14 effect, using that same process, certainly 15 affecting the election process through that 16 petition effort.

17 MS. ROGERS: The ones that we saw
18 mailed out something and it came back
19 undeliverable, these people did not exist.

20 MS. WANG: In the ones that we
21 interviewed, almost nobody that has phoney
22 registration forms led to illegal votes. It's

141

1 not to say it's not a problem, but messing up
2 the voting rolls creates a problem of 3 confidence.

4 MR. PEREZ: That's hard to do now
5 because you have to have a drivers license,
6 social security number, a lot of data. We watch
7 three criteria. If it's not good, they kick it
8 out. That person is in limbo until we can 9 verify something.

10 MS. WANG: Exactly.

11 MR. DONSANTO: We have had several
12 investigations involving these sort of bogus
13 registrations generated through the bounty
14 hunting system of paying people. In most of 15 these cases, complainants were election
16 registrars. The reason it came to our attention

Transcript 051806

17 was because the people did not get on the rolls.

18 It's still a crime.

19 MS. WANG: Right.

20 MR. DONSANTO: But the system worked.

21 MS. WANG: The biggest problem is it
22 drives administrators crazy.

142

1 MR. HEARNE: Well, if they go to the
2 phone books, they are taking sometimes names of 3 legitimate registered voters.

4 MS. WANG: with the statewide
5 database, now it's going to get knocked out.

6 MS. ROGERS: They were making up the 7 social security number, but a lot of them took 8 phone books and they started saying, Apartment
9 1, Apartment 2.

10 MR. DONSANTO: Turn them in, get the 11 two dollars.

12 MR. BAUER: It answers an interesting
13 question. 150 years ago, it wasn't a question.
14 High intensity, high party electoral process,
15 intense, passionate people would march through
16 the street with passion, widespread cheating,
17 you name it, there was a belief in the outcome.
18 Now, we're in a high stake press, low, weak
19 party process. Voter applicant is such that he 20 really actually wouldn't expect an enormous
21 amount of voter fraud because benefits are not 22 seen.

143

1 MS. WANG: If you read Laura Minete's
2 report, she comes to that conclusion, that the 3 structural conditions that led to such fraud in 4 earlier times in our history are no longer
5 present, especially weakening of the party
6 system that so organized these efforts. It is 7 pretty interesting.

8 should we try to move on to the next
9 steps?

10 MS. SIMS: A lot of the public record
11 doesn't have a lot of information on what they 12 meant by voting fraud. Secretary Rokita had 13 asked us to take a look at the legislative 14 history on that.

15 LAIZA: I have the conference reports
16 and I highlight where they use the word fraud.
17 You're welcome to take a look at it. What I can 18 do is e-mail them to you. I can make copies
19 right now or e-mail them to you.

20 MR. HEARNE: You don't need to 21 highlight, just e-mail it.

22 MR. SEREBROV: Actually, can you 144

1 e-mail that to everyone?

2 MS. SIMS: You will see fraud crops
3 up in a lot of other sections, and it's equally
4 unlikely just because they use it in terms of 5 the NIS support to help us prevent fraud, the 6 report that we have already done on the uniform
7 overseas voters issues best practices to avoid
8 fraud there, that sort of thing pops up in a lot

9 of different places.

10 MR. DON SANTO: We have never seen a
11 problem having to do with anything having to do
12 with fraud of any kind. It is not structurally
13 set up that way, put that low on your list. All 14 we have is a criminal statute that deals with 15 fraud.

16 MS. WANG: Its been such a
17 deterrence. These are just my own thoughts
18 about things that I'd like to see done, that we 19 build upon the research that we've done. As I
20 mentioned, and I have mentioned a lot of these 21 already, I would greatly broaden the scope of 22 the type of interviews that we've done to the 145

1 local people, and also to include the federal
2 district election officers and district
3 attorneys like we have discussed a lot, the 4 follow-up on the nexus research to see if there
5 had been some further resolution, follow-up on 6 the reports and books written to see, again,
7 whatever happened to those instances that were 8 cited.

9 I also wanted to talk about both the 10 election protection materials and also the 1800
11 my vote analysis. I don't know how many of you
12 are familiar with this but they took, in 2004,
13 200,000 phone calls and they have created a 14 database in which they have separated out the 15 types of complaints, whether it be a
16 registration problem, intimidation, improperly

17 asking for ID. They have them all systematized
18 from all across the country. They also have 19 over 50,000 audio phone messages that were left
20 that they have also culled through and assigned 21 categories for what type of complaint or 22 allegation was made. And I had thought that

146

1 looking at that data further might be useful.
2 And I have spoken to the people who ran that
3 project, who are willing to share that with me.
4 I also would love to be able to get more and 5 analyze more data and information from the 6 Department of Justice, such as information from 7 the database what's called the interactive case
8 management system that they have on complaints
9 received and how they were dealt with, which I
10 referred to earlier they did not feel
11 comfortable sharing with us. The election data
12 which we also were not able to get, and also 13 reports done by the district election officers
14 who are in every jurisdiction.

15 I also think it would be great to 16 attend the next session of the ballot accessing 17 symposium.

18 MR. DONSANTO: No, that is not
19 possible. That is classified. I didn't set up
20 the rules for this. Believe me, there is no
21 chance.

22 MS. WANG: I think it would be useful
147

1 to do a complete analysis of the federal
Page 109

2 observer errors from 2002, 2004 and 2006.

3 MR. GREENBAUM: Let me give you a
4 little warning about that. Assuming that you
5 have got them.

6 MS. WANG: That were millions of
7 them, I know, but there might be some way to do
8 a sampling or something.

9 MR. GREENBAUM: You would have to 10 have -- I mean, we did -- for our report on the 11 Voting Rights Act, we did have people go through 12 the ones that we had, and it was a lot of people
13 and a few reports, a few different elections,
14 let's put it that way.

15 MS. WANG: I know. And also, again,
16 as I mentioned before, I think it's important
17 that we have an academic institution or 18 individual that focuses on statistical methods
19 for political science research. And I certainly 20 know a bunch of people like that, and would be 21 very interested in working with someone like
22 that in the second phase.

148

1 Those are my suggestions.

2 MR. SEREBROV: Yes. And I had three
3 suggestions. I think two may have gotten up
4 there. One was a survey of state laws.

5 MS. SIMS: I've got that.

6 MR. SEREBROV: One was a survey of 7 district court cases, which I think you may have 8 gotten, survey of district court cases not in 9 specific states. And then the other thing is

Transcript 051806

10 looking at local newspapers in various states
11 and running searches on election issues. I
12 think right now what we need to do is bear down
13 on the local level. Sometimes those are missed
14 in the nexus search. I think we need to plug
15 the holes.

16 MR. HEARNE: One thing that was 17 mentioned here was working with the database to 18 compare, I think it was referenced in the dead
19 voters, just doing a statistical match. Being 20 able to run the voter role versus the dead,
21 divorces, those that did cast ballots,
22 essentially, three data fields, and see where 149

1 you get an overlap.

2 MS. WANG: That is part of the second
3 to the last page.

4 MS. SIMS: So we're looking -- I know
5 we covered some of that over at the FEC, but
6 looking at list maintenance procedures.

7 MR. HEARNE: I mean, you hear the 8 allegation and there's been reports in the 9 Detroit News where they went through and did
10 this process where they marked and found a bunch
11 of votes in the name of those who were dead, and 12 they found the people.

13 MS. ROGERS: That's not going to work
14 unless you actually go back to wherever the 15 voter filled it out because the election
16 official may have actually tagged that dead
17 voter by mistake, instead of the other voter,

Transcript 051806

18 even though the dead voter didn't show up.
19 You have to go to the documentation at the 20 polling place to determine whether they gave 21 credit to the right or wrong voter. There is a
22 huge opportunity for error.

150

1 MR. HEARNE: But if you did that and
2 said, let's take the list of everyone who is a
3 registered voter in whatever area we're looking,
4 whatever state, let's say Texas, then I take
5 that and run it against the social security
6 death list, and get those.

7 MR. PEREZ: Following along, it might
8 be easier, NVRA requires us to put it in 9 suspense because we have to keep them for four 10 years. People can go through and pick out those 11 people and then commit voter fraud based on the 12 fact that those people aren't there any more.
13 That data can be quantitatively checked
14 throughout the state. You can say how many 15 suspense voters did you have in the last 16 election.

17 MR. HEARNE: Then you print that out.

18 MR. PEREZ: But you have such a large
19 number. How many of them were really updating 20 their record and how many of them were not.
21 That would be harder to prove. That's a big 22 hole that we've got.

151

1 MS. WANG: I would want to talk to a

2 political scientist about that. They can figure
3 out ways of doing it, margins of error.

4 MS. ROGERS: I would feel comfortable
5 doing that after this year. We're implementing 6 poll books instead of a manual credit. So the 7 person who actually voted will get the credit
8 for voting. It won't be something going through 9 slips of paper, trying to do that manually for 10 four million voters, but until everyone had an 11 automated process of that sort --

12 MS. WANG: Well, none of that is 13 going to happen any time soon.

14 MR. GREENBAUM: What percentage come
15 out to the polls?

16 MS. ROGERS: In the presidential
17 election, you get a large number of inactive
18 voters.

19 MR. PEREZ: They become inactive, yet
20 they show up to vote, so it would be hard to 21 tell which ones were not legitimate voters.

22 MR. HEARNE: You can run that against 152

1 the social security death list.

2 MR. PEREZ: Well, the state does that
3 automatically.

4 MS. SIMS: I know Kentucky was one of
5 the first big states that did that statewide,
6 and they did have one instance that the mother
7 of a state legislator was listed as dead and she 8 wasn't.

9 MR. HEARNE: I assume you would have

10 some errors.

11 MS. SIMS: It gives you something to 12 start with, and that's subject to confirmation,
13 helps you target.

14 MS. ROGERS: I think you might get
15 better data if you match data state to state,
16 try to determine who the double voting and dead
17 voters are.

18 MS. WANG: I'm sorry. We have a side
19 bar going on. Anyway, I'm sorry about that.
20 So those are our suggestions for next steps that 21 the second phase could undertake.

22 Anything else that we can think of? 153

1 MR. GREENBAUM: I am still worried
2 about -- one of our big areas of concern is
3 deceptive practices. And I am struggling with 4 how to measure that, how to define it. It's not
5 something that you're going to find in the cases
6 so far, for various reasons.

7 MS. WANG: You do find it in the
8 news.

9 MR. GREENBAUM: You do find it in the 10 news.

11 MR. DONSANTO: There is also a range
12 of different types. These things range from 13 relatively innocuous communications to ones that 14 are a terribly pernicious.

15 MR. GREENBAUM: Kind of how you sort
16 that. I don't know if you have any ideas.

17 MR. DONSANTO: A series of letters

18 that are circulated saying something stupid like 19 Republican are not allowed to vote in this 20 election, which is idiotic. Another on the 21 other end would be something that suggests to 22 people that the polling places in one fact when,
154

1 in fact, it is another, or Republicans vote on
2 one day and Democrats vote on another.

3 MR. GREENBAUM: You saw it all but
4 how do you measure that?

5 MR. DONSANTO: In terms of their
6 damage.

7 MS. WANG: Although that is the kind
8 of things that organizations could provide more
9 eyes and ears on. Well, actually there you have 10 real evidence. You have phone calls.

11 MR. GREENBAUM: I brought some of the 12 fliers with me, if anyone wants to look at it.

13 MR. DONSANTO: We have some on board
14 of elections stationary. Somebody got a hold of 15 board of elections stationary.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: Unfortunately.

17 MS. SIMS: We have got the idea of 18 looking at some of the phone calls because we 19 have phone logs here that we keep for calls
20 related to election.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: Can I get a stapler?

22 MS. SIMS: I don't know if we have 155

1 access to groups' outside phone logs. I know we
2 have had problems with that before, phone logs
Page 115

3 for other groups.

4 MS. WANG: Well, you guys would share
5 your stuff with us, right?

6 MR. GREENBAUM: Yes, except for the 7 identifying information of the individual who 8 called in.

9 MS. SIMS: So we could at least get
10 an indication.

11 MR. GREENBAUM: That stuff is
12 available. I can give you the website.
13 The one that I think that I will say is that we 14 will do the -- the quality of the data will be 15 better in the future than it was in 2004.

16 MS. WANG: Deceptive practices is one
17 area where you have some piece of evidence. So
18 you are not necessarily having that problem,
19 allegation versus reality, whereas we actually
20 made the decision not to go through election
21 protections data during this phase because of 22 the problem of trying to weed out allegation

156

1 from reality. I think deceptive practices is
2 one area where we can use the data from various
3 organizations out there monitoring the situation
4 without any controversy.

5 MR. SEREBROV: You also might be able
6 to get some from the either the secretary of the 7 states office or state board of election
8 commissions.

9 MS. SIMS: That was a question I have 10 since we have two state officials here.

Transcript 051806

11 Should we look at the feasibility of getting 12 reports? You already put reports together, and 13 I know that's not the case in all states.

14 MR. SEREBROV: Arkansas does.

15 MS. WANG: It could be part of the 16 Election Day survey.

17 MS. SIMS: Well, that's something we
18 could explore.

19 MS. HODGKINS: There are several
20 states that have voter fraud units to 21 investigate these matters where there is at 22 least an opportunity for people to report, at

157

1 least. We did keep reports on what would then
2 be transmitted to the District Attorneys Office
3 for prosecution.

4 MR. SEREBROV: Arkansas didn't have
5 that. I assume Louisiana did. Do you know
6 which states have it or which states don't?

7 MS. HODGKINS: I don't.

8 MR. SEREBROV: Is there any way you
9 can get a list?

10 MS. HODGKINS: I'm sure there is.

11 MR. DONSANTO: Do a survey.

12 MS. WANG: I also think there is 13 unity in getting a case management system for 14 the voting system.

15 MS. ROGERS: In terms of state law,
16 what does each secretary of state or state
17 election board -- how do they handle complaints
18 at the time it hits the door; who makes the

Transcript 051806

19 determination of whether that is a valid
20 complaint or invalid complaint. I think we 21 found that varied.

22 MS. ROGERS: It varies. We have even 158

1 changed our own internal policies since I became
2 director. The former director actually sort of 3 looked at some of these, and you just don't
4 always have enough information to do that.

5 MR. SEREBROV: I think you have to 6 start with the foundational question is, does 7 the secretary of state or the state board have 8 the authority to handle complaints at all.

9 MS. ROGERS: Right. And at some
10 point, I realize that in any event, the question
11 would be, what do you do when the complaint
12 comes, period.

13 MS. WANG: We asked that of all the 14 administrators that we interviewed, and we got a
15 different answer from everybody.

16 MR. WEINBERG: I actually asked the 17 state election directors that through NASAD a 18 few years back, and they distributed the 19 question to the state election directors. And 20 it turned out that hardly any state election
21 directors, at least in 2001, I think, had much
22 authority at all to do anything about anything.
159

1 MS. WANG: They don't have authority.
2 What we heard is they will get complaint but

3 then they will throw them out to whoever does
4 have authority.

5 MR. WEINBERG: By the way, I don't
6 know what Department of Justice case management
7 system you're referring to, but if it's as good
8 as the one they have had for the last 40 years,
9 I wouldn't suggest you waste time on it.

10 MR. SEREBROV: John Tanner didn't say
11 a lot of anything.

12 MS. WANG: No. He didn't want to 13 share a lot.

14 MR. PEREZ: Peggy, are you sure this
15 wasn't a typo?

16 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: Each state,
17 under HAVA, is required to post complaints.
18 Every polling place in the country in federal 19 elections is to post its administrative 20 complaint procedures. I look for that when I go
21 out to places all over the country. The chief
22 election authority is the one who sends it out.

□ 160

1 MS. WANG: I would be curious to know
2 the extent states are implementing
3 administrative complaint procedures under HAVA,
4 because I don't think they all are.

5 MS. ROGERS: I can tell you we have
6 it, and it's just sitting out there.

7 MS. WANG: Even if they informed
8 HAVA, I don't think people even know about it to 9 use it, and I think maybe that's something else
10 that's not my bailiwick, but something ought to 11 be looked at.

12 MR. PEREZ: State of Texas made
13 posters four feet by three feet. They go to 14 each poll, red, white, and black, and they do
15 call, because I have got several calls and they 16 ask me what happened.

17 MS. SIMS: That is another research
18 project we have somebody working on. We have a
19 Design For Democracy group to try to help
20 election officials make them simple and clear so
21 people can see this information a lot better
22 than what we do now.

161

1 MS. WANG: Also, it might be wise for
2 the EAC to undertake as another project to
3 investigate or do a survey of whether the states
4 are actually implementing the administrative
5 complaint procedure and whether that can be used
6 as another tool for quantifying or deferring or 7 investigating these types of activities.

8 MR. PEREZ: You could query the law,
9 see how many complaints.

10 MS. WANG: If they were actually
11 using the complaint procedure.

12 MR. PEREZ: But that would give you
13 something to look at.

14 MS. ROGERS: It's not that we don't 15 get complaints. It's just that not too many 16 fall under administrative complaints under HAVA.
17 There is a narrow window there.

18 MS. WANG: Right, but at least you

19 would know of the complaints, whether you refer 20 them out to another entity, at least you could 21 have that much information.

22 MR. GREENBAUM: How many complaints 162

1 do you get from a major election?

2 MS. ROGERS: We get -- gosh, without
3 having the form in front of me. We could get
4 anywhere from a hundred or more questions,
5 complaints. They could range from a hundred to 6 200. What we do now, we have started this since 7 2004, we have so many people taking calls on 8 Election Day, and when you can't get through to 9 say our office or a county office, then even the 10 calls are spilling over from elections agencies
11 into other divisions of the Secretary of State's 12 office. It's like whoever they can get a call
13 to on that day. We have actually provided forms
14 to everyone that may take a call, and then we go
15 through after the fact and they have to 16 identify, does this person need a call back,
17 were they satisfied, was there anything here
18 that needs immediate action or that needs to be 19 forwarded to us immediately. And we follow up
20 on every single complaint that we can not find 21 out right then was unjustified. And some of 22 them maybe couldn't find the polling place.

163

1 They moved it. I just didn't know.

2 But we take all of those complaints and then

3 follow through. It is time-consuming and it is 012500

4 taking up more time and energy than we have ever
5 put to it in the past.

6 MR. SEREBROV: Does anyone in your
7 office have the authority to do something about
8 complaints?

9 MS. ROGERS: Well, we probably take
10 more authority than we really have under the 11 law, if you want to get right down to it. We 12 have monitors and observers out there. They 13 contact us immediately, and we do apply some 14 immediate pressure if we think something's
15 happened. We act like we have it.

16 MR. SEREBROV: One thing we asked the 17 interviewees, I think that is the way it is in a 18 lot of states -- should there be some kind of 19 administrative judges or anyone specifically
20 trained in this area who would quickly dispose 21 of these things, what do you all think about 22 that?

164

1 MS. WANG: I think they say in
2 Pennsylvania they have special courts.

3 MR. HEARNE: Election courts, it is
4 mostly Philadelphia. It may be mostly there
5 that they get used but they have special
6 election courts set up, an election court.

7 MR. SEREBROV: Are they the same
8 judges that sit as normal?

9 MR. HEARNE: Most states, they would
10 have a separate procedure for designating when 11 it gets to that level. What Philadelphia has is 12 they have this whole host of election -- they 13 call them judges. They are not a full court

14 judge, but they act in that capacity.

15 MR. SEREBROV: See, here's where the 16 system's bogged down in at least any state that 17 there are election judges. In Arkansas, you get 18 a complaint, right, someone files suit. It goes
19 to the circuit court judge. Circuit court judge
20 is elected. Now, up to three years ago, the 21 circuit court judge was elected on a ballot.

22 So the circuit court judge never rules the way

165

1 just a completely neutral judge should rule. It
2 just doesn't happen, so all those cases get
3 appealed to the Supreme Court of Arkansas.
4 Supreme Court of Arkansas is elected. Then you
5 get have very strange things go every which way
6 when it comes to election cases.

7 MS. WANG: Do you have any sense
8 maybe this is one more thing to investigate
9 further, whether the Pennsylvania system works.

10 MR. HEARNE: I have the general sense
11 I guess it sort of works and it sort of doesn't,
12 and there is not a whole lot of confidence in 13 it.

14 MS. WANG: Maybe it is something to 15 look at though. I know they certainly have that 16 system. Maybe you and Craig would know better.
17 They have election courts in other countries.

18 MR. HEARNE: The biggest problem is 19 having real clear rules beforehand so that

20 whoever is making that decision, it is not 21 perceived of as a biased perception, but that 22 it's just, hi, here it is. We have a procedure.

166

1 I don't care what party you are.

2 MR. WEINBERG: In most countries
3 where you have an election procedure, it is 4 centralized, and so they get immediate
5 responses. They do have courts, but on Election
6 Day, it is whoever is running the election tells
7 the people the polling stations' precinct people
8 to get it right.

9 MS. WANG: So election courts aren't
10 used on Election Day.

11 MR. WEINBERG: No, not much.

12 MS. ROGERS: Each county has to sit
13 until the election has closed out for the day
14 for the purposes of hearing something like a 15 polling place should remain open, but any 16 allegation of fraud would not necessarily be 17 there that day. It would be more to mitigate,
18 and we need to hold that polling place open.

19 MR. SEREBROV: See, in Arkansas, 99
20 percent of the problems used to occur on the day
21 of election that they were sued over.

22 And the problem is the Supreme Court of 167

1 Arkansas, in its infinite wisdom, has decided
2 that election law is discretionary after the
3 election. So if a violation occurs on the day

4 of the election and you file the day after the 5 election, they don't have to apply the law.

6 MR. WEINBERG: Everybody does that,
7 that's throughout the whole country, mandatory
8 before, discretionary after. But, you know, I
9 always thought that it would be good for the 10 state supervisor of elections office to have the 11 authority to get the word down to the polling
12 place to stop doing it wrong and start doing it
13 right, I have always thought.

14 MS. WANG: They informally do that.

15 MR. WEINBERG: Hardly anybody has any 16 authority.

17 MS. ROGERS: Don't tell them that.

18 MR. WEINBERG: But I have always
19 thought that if everybody did in the polling
20 place what state law said they should do, you
21 wouldn't have any problem.

22 MR. PEREZ: Secretaries of states are 168

1 going in reviewing the situation. It is up to
2 the local mission.

3 MS. ROGERS: To take them before the
4 state election board. If we find an infraction
5 at the poll worker level, then we bring it to 6 the state investigation board. It goes forward
7 for administrative hearing.

8 MR. SEREBROV: The legislature won't
9 permit them to have an attorney.

10 MS. ROGERS: we call them
11 policymakers.

12 MR. GREENBAUM: We're seeing in some
13 states consolidation for giving the head
14 secretary of state or whatever statewide
15 election official more authority, so it is 16 moving towards that direction.

17 MS. WANG: In other directions.

18 MS. SIMS: We should be able to get
19 into that, if we do a survey of state laws
20 and/or regulations.

21 MS. ROGERS: Like Georgia, there are
22 little counties that won't comply with absentee
169

1 battling deadlines. We were the ones that
2 entered into the consent order with the DOJ. So
3 states should need more authority.

4 MR. PEREZ: Looking at voting fraud,
5 a type command structure from the top down would
6 wrinkle it out real fast. I'm not sure that's 7 the problem. At the lower level, it is more of 8 a dysfunctional structure thing more than voter
9 fraud. Voter fraud is going to be committed by 10 parties outside. We need a tighter command but 11 that's not going to be in you all's recommend 12 because that is not really voter fraud.

13 MR. HEARNE: Where it goes to voter
14 fraud would be for the statewide half, for the 15 agent of the state to keep that clean, current
16 and accurate, that is the biggest reason
17 somebody shows up at the poll. So if you have a
18 clean, current, accurate, statewide list.

19 MR. PEREZ: In that respect, you're

20 right, but the rest of it is still not there for 21 the state of Texas, so they cannot fix a bad
22 problem. San Antonio had problems for decades. 170

1 The secretary of state knew about them, could
2 not do anything about them.

3 MR. ROKITA: One methodology that you
4 might want to investigate is to determine across
5 the states what kind of data facilitation there
6 is from a county level to the state level.

7 MS. WANG: None.

8 MR. ROKITA: Actually, that is not
9 accurate because Indiana --

10 MS. WANG: well, not many states.
11 we had to ask a lot of people. No. Go ahead.

12 MR. ROKITA: We just passed a law
13 that is going to require county clerks, any 14 voter challenge that is made, any precincts in 15 their county, a record has to be transmitted to 16 the state level. Anything can be passed on to a
17 prosecutor. We have the statewide voter files
18 as vehicles to quickly pass that information.
19 So you may want to investigate.

20 MR. SEREBROV: well, I think what are 21 you suggesting that there should be -- I almost 22 don't want to use this word. Are you suggesting 171

1 that there should be some uniform laws?

2 MR. ROKITA: No, no, no -- whoever
3 the reporter is.

4 MR. HEARNE: I think he said it three

012508

5 times, for the record.

6 MR. ROKITA: Paul knows from whence I
7 come in other meetings, but I guess, again, to 8 identify methodologies, this may be where you
9 can get that kind of data, then have 10 quantitative analysis to use, something that we 11 as a state all by our lonesome figured out we 12 can do.

13 MR. CORTES: Perhaps not a uniform
14 law, but perhaps for us to look at some model
15 statutes in different states, because I don't 16 think all states are at the point where they are 17 taking the initiative to do that. And so if 18 they have some model statutes to look at, they 19 can say, oh, this might fit our situation or 20 this might not fit, and we can adjust
21 accordingly.

22 MS. WANG: We're talking about for 172

1 the purposes of data collection and doing
2 research, I am curious if anyone knows which
3 states are the ones that already are collecting
4 data, county level data, at the state level,
5 because my impression has been that they are not
6 doing that, but you're telling me something
7 else.

8 MR. GREENBAUM: Of voter fraud?

9 MS. WANG: Complaints.

10 MR. HEARNE: There's been particular
11 investigations after different elections that I
12 am aware of, but not as a practice

13 institutionally in that category.

14 MS. ROGERS: I don't go through and 15 put it all in a spread sheet, but we do maintain 16 the complaints.

17 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: In the state
18 plans that were filed with us, did any detail
19 complaint procedures?

20 MS. SIMS: Reporting back to the 21 state, that I don't know.

22 MR. CORTES: I think in terms of 173

1 going back a second to the administrative
2 complaint procedure, that being a tool for this,
3 I think part of the problem that we run into is 4 that HAVA only requires that those complaints
5 procedure be for complaints and implementation
6 of Title 3 requirements. Some states have 7 though taken it a step further, and in creating 8 the administrative complaints procedure that 9 they need to under HAVA, have expanded it and 10 made that their standard complaint procedure for 11 anything that goes on dealing with any 12 complaints dealing with elections.

13 MS. SIMS: California has a combo
14 form, a form for Title 3 complaints and other
15 things that might go voting rights.

16 MS. WANG: I would love to see the 17 forms.

18 MR. CORTES: So there are some states
19 that combine that, and have one procedure, and 20 use one form that's available for all sorts of

21 complaints.

22 MS. WANG: Do they keep records? 174

1 MR. CORTES: I'm just telling you the
2 administrative complaint procedure, some states
3 have done that. Some states will only take the 4 very specific thing that HAVA asked them do and
5 have other procedures that they use for state
6 specifically complaints.

7 MS. SIMS: No more ideas, we're all
8 worn out?

9 MR. ROKITA: I have some thematic
10 thoughts, if I can share them, what we haven't 11 talked about today yet, but I did see some up in 12 some of the interviews, is the idea of some of 13 these deterrents or perceived deterrents to 14 fraud being confidence builders for the entire 15 prospect of going to the polls and having your 16 vote count but only once. I think that should 17 be a significant part or central to the work
18 certainly of the EAC and of this report.

19 Just like to give a statement against
20 interest, having a paper audit trail to machines
21 is less based on empirical data that electronic 22 machines are wrong and more based on a

175

1 confidence builder.

2 MS. WANG: Although I would say that
3 we're trying to stick with empirical data and 4 not feel-good measures. So I would feel it a

5 little risky of making a recommendation purely 6 so people would feel better.

7 MR. ROKITA: Again, I am having a
8 very difficult time articulating today.

9 MS. WANG: Maybe I am not 10 understanding.

11 MR. ROKITA: Well, let me finish, and
12 that is to say that, let's take, for example,
13 the risk analysis, if you rank something like
14 that as to what's easier, what is harder to do,
15 we have it look at it from a wholistic approach
16 as well. And that is, every methodology, if it
17 is valid, that could help deter fraud needs to 18 be looked at from the goal of building
19 confidence in our elections, where that 20 confidence is deserved. And I would hope that 21 that gets into some of the thoughts and the 22 language and the semantics of this report.

176

1 MR. GREENBAUM: I think what I would
2 say in response to that is if you're going to
3 look at that, I would also want to look at to 4 what degree certain measures might also impact
5 access to the ballot. Because if you take a
6 certain measure where there is no empirical data
7 saying this is something that needs to be done
8 but it may add to voter confidence, but on the 9 flip side, that particular measure may impair or 10 prevent access to the ballot for certain people,
11 that need to be looked at as well.

12 MS. WANG: That's what I was trying

13 to get at. Once you start doing something 14 purely on what the general public perceives to 15 be the biggest problems, rather than trying to 16 take an empirical approach and find out what the 17 problems really are, and addressing what the 18 problems really are, you start not expending
19 your resources in the most efficiency way.

20 MR. ROKITA: Well, we have already
21 decided at the beginning and throughout this 22 discussion that it is very difficult to get

177

1 empirical data, especially on this particular
2 issue, which has the syrup on top it of it that
3 doesn't include dispassionate actors.

4 Having said that, the point here is,
5 whether you have an actual conviction of voter
6 fraud or whether you have someone who was in 7 line at the polling place who thinks they saw
8 voter fraud, it is the same effect. It is 9 equal, and that is, they don't come back to 10 participate in the process. So you can't ignore
11 that fact and just focus on the data that you
12 might have, and that's part of the human 13 involvement interaction in the electoral 14 process.

15 And as long as humans are involved in 16 the process, you're going to have a dichotomy
17 there. Again, the effect is exactly the same.
18 No convictions for in person fraud at the poll,
19 no relation to whether or not its happened.
20 Your interviews even say that it's very hard to 21 detect, so you have got to incorporate that

22 reality into this report, if it's going to have 178

1 validity to the public and to election
2 officials.

3 MR. PEREZ: Brings up the semantics
4 because you're saying no system should go out
5 having a voter verifiable paper trail.
6 Every system in Texas has a paper trail.

7 The large part of perception and real
8 fraud is the perception of a paper trail or not.
9 The same thing semantics can be possibly
10 incorporated in there to educate them.

11 MS. WANG: That is the approach I
12 would prefer to take, is to educate people as to 13 what the problems really are, rather than you
14 trying to address problems that they think only
15 exist but may not in reality.

16 MR. ROKITA: I'm not asking you to 17 make up a fix. I'm asking you to realize that 18 there is a very real issue out there. whether 19 fraud is perceived or you have a real
20 conviction, the effect is the same.

21 MR. GINSBERG: The problem that I
22 think you have with this is fraud and 179

1 intimidation become two sides of the same coin
2 and they are used for political purposes. They 3 are used for get-out-to-vote purposes.

4 So the notion of agreeing on what the
5 problem is, is going to be really, really tough,
Page 133

6 which to me goes back to the issue of having 7 people, where the fraud or intimidation takes
8 place from both parties, since they are the ones
9 that are starting all the problems that 10 challenge the legitimacy of the election.

11 MR. GREENBAUM: Our counterpart's not
12 here anymore.

13 MR. GINSBERG: I waited for just that 14 moment.

15 MR. HEARNE: The point's coming up
16 and I think it's one when I was an advisor to 17 Carter Baker, the underlying point of this 18 effort is to increase voter confidential. It is 19 also to convince the winner of an election that 20 he won. The trick is to make the loser knows
21 that it was a fair election, so long as you come 22 out after every election process saying it was

180

1 stolen or they intimated my base, whatever it
2 is, is an erosive charge.

3 I understand the EAC's charge is to
4 come up with a way to look at that process,
5 quantify it, develop a process to say it does or 6 don't exist to this degree, here's what 7 happened, and here's ideas on places to go to 8 address it so the next election and the one
9 after and the one after, we're going to say it
10 may or may not have been the one I wanted, but I
11 at least felt the voters decided, not some 12 special group, or lawyers, or judges
13 manipulating. I think that's the objective we

14 want overall.

15 Perception is important, and the 16 empirical information we're starting with is to 17 say, how did we find out, where do we hear about 18 to go to find it. I like Ben's suggestion of 19 why don't we look at the next election as a
20 model, whatever way we can come up with a
21 statistically -- have people going to the 22 polling places, to look at that as a way to try

181

1 to quantify and identify those issues.

2 MS. WANG: I guess I would reiterate
3 John's point about making sure that when you try
4 and engage in confidence building measures that
5 you aren't at the same time disenfranchising
6 more people than you're giving confidence too.

7 MR. GINSBERG: There are a whole
8 bunch of assumptions built into that statement
9 that demonstrate why you may have difficulty
10 getting any sort of agreement on what you're 11 saying.

12 MR. GREENBAUM: If you want to go
13 back to what the language earlier before we had 14 a recitation of what the language is that the 15 EAC is supposed to be doing. If it's methods of 16 identifying, deterring, and investigating, voter
17 fraud, I just don't see where people's 18 perceptions come into that.

19 MR. ROKITA: I am looking at 20
20 interviews worth of perceptions.

21 MR. GINSBERG: If people's
 Page 135

22 perceptions of this don't matter, then why are 182

1 we doing this. You want to have confidence in 2 the system.

3 MR. WANG: You want a system that's
4 actually fair and accurate.

5 MR. GINSBERG: Listen, what you just
6 said means that your definition of what is fair
7 and accurate is not going to be universally
8 accepted. It's still two sides of the coin of 9 the issue, and your perception of that is not 10 going to be shared.

11 MR. PEREZ: What if we put a third
12 person in that, Republican, Democrat,
13 independent?

14 MR. GREENBAUM: Not even independent,
15 nonpartisan.

16 MR. ROKITA: That animal doesn't
17 exist in this business.

18 MR. GREENBAUM: Doesn't exist in your 19 business.

20 MR. ROKITA: No, this business.

21 MS. ROGERS: I tend to look at the
22 logistics of the things instead of the lofty 183

1 ideas. You talk about the observers, that's not
2 a bad thing. We work, at the lawyers committee,
3 we work with them on that but elections within 4 the next decade are not going to occur on
5 election day. Elections are already now

6 occurring in the week or two weeks leading up to
7 Election Day. They are occurring by mail. So
8 putting all your resources in Election Day is
9 not going to be an answer for very much longer.
10 Then how many resources do you have to extend
11 that out to two-week period to insure that you
12 have all these monitors. In addition to that,
13 you have got to be so careful that -- how do you
14 determine who gets to observe and who doesn't.
15 Obviously, Democrats and Republicans want a
16 place at the table. Well, in our state, the
17 green carding and libertarians want a place at
18 the table as well.

19 Parties are allowed to appoint two
20 poll watchers and then the independent
21 candidates, one. We have got a lot of other
22 voter verifiable and paper audit trail folks who

184

1 want to send in observers as well. We get
2 questions from overseas. Very quickly, you can
3 overwhelm a polling place where they are going
4 to feel intimidated or suppressed when they walk
5 in the door.

6 It can work, but in order for there
7 to be any support from my peers, there would
8 have to be a lot of caveats that went with it,
9 as far as the training, who got to observe, who
10 they notified of what they see on Election Day,
11 do they notify their party, the national party,
12 and then you get a fax that says we just found
13 out blah, blah, blah and we're putting you on

6 occurring in the week or two weeks leading up to
7 Election Day. They are occurring by mail. So
8 putting all your resources in Election Day is
9 not going to be an answer for very much longer.
10 Then how many resources do you have to extend
11 that out to two-week period to insure that you
12 have all these monitors. In addition to that,
13 you have got to be so careful that -- how do you
14 determine who gets to observe and who doesn't.
15 Obviously, Democrats and Republicans want a
16 place at the table. Well, in our state, the
17 green carding and libertarians want a place at
18 the table as well.

19 Parties are allowed to appoint two
20 poll watchers and then the independent
21 candidates, one. We have got a lot of other
22 voter verifiable and paper audit trail folks who

184

1 want to send in observers as well. We get
2 questions from overseas. Very quickly, you can
3 overwhelm a polling place where they are going
4 to feel intimidated or suppressed when they walk
5 in the door.

6 It can work, but in order for there
7 to be any support from my peers, there would
8 have to be a lot of caveats that went with it,
9 as far as the training, who got to observe, who
10 they notified of what they see on Election Day,
11 do they notify their party, the national party,
12 and then you get a fax that says we just found
13 out blah, blah, blah and we're putting you on

14 notice. Just random thoughts.

15 MR. GINSBERG: All of that's correct.
16 We all agree that there is a problem with fraud
17 and intimidation taking place in elections. The 18 question is how many prosecutions are there on a
19 regular basis that show that there is either
20 fraud or intimidation.

21 MR. DONSANTO: I don't think that is
22 a measure of anything. There is a hell of a lot
185

1 more out there than we ever find, and there is a
2 hell of a lot more, we don't have the resources.

3 MR. GINSBERG: And rumors about it
4 are greater than the actuality.

5 MR. DONSANTO: There is a lot more
6 out there than we ever catch, and the rumors are 7 even more.

8 MR. GINSBERG: Exactly. So if you
9 want to deal with the problem of the electors
10 having confidence in their elections, you have 11 got to deal with all the rumors that are out
12 there. And I love academic studies and surveys, 13 but you've got to have people on the ground in 14 the polling places or watching the two-week
15 process that takes place, and verifying that.
16 And all the academic studies in the world are 17 not going to get at that public perception
18 issue.

19 MS. WANG: Definitely, a lot of the 20 people we talked to recommended more monitoring,
21 including Joe Rich, who was a big proponent of 22 that.

186

1 MR. HEARNE: I think the point was
2 made increasingly and the trend is there, we're 3 going into more and more absentee balloting, and 4 the one point is a pretty broad consensus here,
5 where vote fraud does go on, that there is a lot
6 of it in absentee balloting, an area that merits
7 scrutiny, and understanding, involvement, and 8 that's going to be an area that increases in 9 terms of availability of those kinds of avenues.

10 MR. ROKITA: My other point to that 11 would be just because we identify or focus on 12 absentee fraud as an area where there are 13 problems, and I certainly agree, we, I think,
14 have to be careful of leaving the impression of 15 that means it is not occurring in other areas
16 because we just don't know.

17 MR. DONSANTO: Right, it does occur
18 in other areas. Absentee ballots happens to be 19 the methodology of the moment.

20 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: You know,
21 Craig, you have served as an observer, and I
22 know you have. It just so happens this morning

187

1 from 8 to 9:30, I met with the head of OSC, who
2 was here because they had a little team here.
3 They are going to send a team to observe in
4 November. They have a method they have used
5 when you go observe an election. You have a
6 form you fill out. They have people, long-term

7 observers, who go six weeks before the election,
8 and short-term, who go for a week, and all this
9 material is brought in election night. All
10 night long they calculate it, then they issue a 11 statement at 1:00 the next day saying whether 12 the elections were free and fair, whether you
13 have can confidence/no confidence in the winner.
14 And in Ukraine, they didn't have confidence in 15 the winner, brought down the Government.
16 They had another election six weeks later but 17 they use that method of observation because of 18 perception that people have whether the 19 elections are free and fair.

20 Jimmy Carter has done similar things
21 in Central America. The Carter Center does that 22 too, but they have a method to do that. You

188

1 have been part of it and I have been part of it,
2 to try to make that judgement call, and they are
3 all independent people from different countries
4 that go to do it.

5 MS. WANG: Maybe that's what we need
6 is international observers.

7 MR. GREENBAUM: It's a problem
8 because they can't get in the polling place in a
9 lot of the states. They even said that as part
10 of their report.

11 MR. ROKITA: Don't we add value to 12 this entire process, if you go and look at what
13 Paul just described and analyze it and present
14 it as an idea, isn't that what this is?

Transcript 051806

15 MS. SIMS: That would be in the next
16 phase.

17 MS. WANG: All of this is in the next
18 phase.

19 MS. SIMS: Looking at the project
20 that the Commission decides to pursue and the 21 boards are happy with that idea.

22 MR. HEARNE: What is the next step 189

1 from here?

2 MS. SIMS: If we're all done with
3 ideas.

4 MR. ROKITA: I just wanted to get a
5 couple more things done to finish up my last
6 point. We're not sure that fraud at the polling
7 place doesn't exist. We can't conclude that.
8 That is my last point.

9 There has been a discussion about a
10 political science professor being utilized. I
11 think the EAC needs to be very careful in who 12 they select, because all the time and effort and 13 money that's been spent up to date and would be 14 spent in the future could be invalidated by a
15 wrong selection in the eyes of some group. So
16 whether you have two folks, political science
17 professors, however you decide to work it,
18 please research, you, as a taxpayer, to be 19 careful who you pick.

20 I thank you.

21 MR. PEREZ: I'd like to make a
22 statement. I am not a lawyer so I don't know

1 how far this would fly. If you're trying to
2 query on developing statistical data, why don't
3 you put a question on the ballot? Everybody
4 walk in, I believe this election was fair. No,
5 I believe there was fraud here. Just ask them.

6 MR. DONSANTO: How are they supposed
7 to know that until the election has been run?

8 MR. PEREZ: They have already been
9 intimidated while they are casting their ballot.

10 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: How about if
11 there is a none of the above on the ballots?

12 MR. GINSBERG: It would be really
13 good for business.

14 MR. PEREZ: If they come in, I would
15 want to vote for that one. Really, you're 16 trying to get statistics from the voters, trying
17 to get them outside, trying to catch them
18 inside, catch them on the ballot.

19 MS. SIMS: well, the next step is 20 that our two consultants would be consolidating
21 the preliminary research that they have and also 22 the working group's deliberation in his order to 191

1 present a report to our Commissioners. And our
2 Commissioners will, obviously, take a look at
3 that.

4 And then when you deem it's ready,
5 we'll have it sent out to our Board of Advisors
6 and our Standards Board for their review and

7 comment. HAVA does mandate that our research
8 efforts are supposed to be reviewed by our 9 boards. Depending on what we get back, and what 10 the Commissioners decide to do, and what kind of 11 budget we get, then we may be able to prioritize 12 some of the ideas or determine which ones we can 13 do. Inevitably, they are going to have to be 14 below a certain dollar limit. And so we would 15 put the project out, put an RFP up.

16 In terms of people who would lean one
17 way or another, we would take a look at that 18 when we're writing the RFP to determine that the 19 team has different points of views.

20 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: We have also 21 set some peer review groups for many of our 22 studies that have a balance of folks, academics
192

1 particularly, to take a look at the work that's
2 being done by folks to make sure we're being
3 looked at by people who have different
4 philosophies, different viewpoints.

5 MS. SIMS: And depending on what
6 we're able to do, we may or may not get a
7 working group to work with us on that.
8 Generally, speaking it is wiser to get the 9 working group further in on the beginning.
10 We're bringing you in as the tail group, is a 11 little bit different than I am used to doing at 12 FEC. So we may take a look at that on whatever
13 we decide to do next on bringing the working
14 group together in the earlier phase to offer

15 their advice in an earlier stage.

16 Any questions about that? Well, I
17 want to thank you all very much for coming. I
18 know our consultants have really -- I'm sure
19 they have gotten a lot out of it. I have.

20 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: I also want to 21 thank you too on behalf of the Commissioners who 22 couldn't be here today, to Tova and Job for your 193

1 work thus far. This is an important item for
2 the Commissioners, and the we'll move on it
3 quickly. I suspect -- I don't know that we have
4 anything budgeted for 2006 for this but October
5 1 starts, we will have some funds, and we can do
6 some of the things that you all suggested we
7 should do to come up with further detailed study
8 of this. But this has been helpful just sitting
9 through here the last hour-and-a-half.

10 I was director of elections in St.
11 Louis County. Craig, we had some federal 12 prosecutions. We had plenty of nursing home
13 absentee fraud. I was in St. Louis County, but 14 a lot of it came at the local level. When 15 you're running for police chief in the city,
16 that's where we saw a lot of the election fraud
17 too, but it occurred in the federal elections.
18 We had people voting in 1988. So those things
19 happened, so I have seen it myself.

20 I am also aware of things that you
21 pointed out here, these kinds of things. This 22 is awful for people to try to trick people in 194

1 ways like this, to keep them from participating
2 in our democracy. That's just not right. It's 3 wrong.

4 MR. DONSANTO: I am aware of this
5 one.

6 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: We don't want
7 that to happen.

8 MR. DONSANTO: We're unable to find
9 out who did it.

10 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: We appreciate
11 your work, hope this will continue in some 12 fashion, that you all can be participants in 13 what we do next. Thank you for your time today.

14 MS. SIMS: I also want to know for 15 those who are traveling out of town, Devon put 16 an information package for you on how you turn
17 over the receipts that we need, so we can make 18 sure you get money. And if you have any 19 questions, please contact her about that.

20 MS. WANG: Thank you so much.

21 (Whereupon, at approximately 5:00 o'clock,
22 p.m., the meeting adjourned.)

Re: Preliminary Work Plan
Date: September 7, 2005

The following is a preliminary work plan and division of labor for the project on voter fraud and voter intimidation:

MONTH ONE (beginning the date contracts are finalized):

- I. Defining Fraud/Intimidation
 - a. In person meeting and discussion among consultants to:
 - i. Determine what we believe the parameters of the terms fraud and intimidation should be for our research purposes. (All)
 - ii. Create a list of state and local officials, third party representatives, attorneys, scholars, etc. to interview and/or survey to assist in this process of definition (All)
 - b. Interviews of individuals identified as having expertise (Job and Tova)
 - c. Analysis of existing research (Job and Tova)
- II. Obtaining research assistance (e.g. interns, law clerks) (All)

MONTH TWO:

- III. Examining the Feasibility of Quantifying the Level of Incidence of Different Types of Fraud
 - a. Looking at how we can develop a statistically sound research instrument
 - i. Discussion with political and social scientists, legal scholars in the field (Tova and Steve)
 - b. Determination as to information that would be required for a potential survey; identification of potential survey states to ensure a fair representation of different systems (All)
 - c. Preliminary survey of case law of recent prosecutions for fraud/intimidation (Job)
 - d. Interviews with state and local officials, third party groups, election lawyers to assess what they believe are the most prevalent problems (All)

MONTH THREE:

- IV. Preliminary assessment of the federal, state and local legal capacity to handle fraud and intimidation cases
 - a. Case law research (Job)
 - b. Survey of current state election codes (Tova and Job)
 - c. Analysis of Department of Justice Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions work in this area (Tova)

- d. Survey and assessment of who has enforcement responsibility and accountability in each state and the extent to which that entity exercises that authority (All)

MONTH FOUR:

- V. Report of Preliminary Findings (Tova and Job)
- VI. Assembling the Working Group
 - a. Developing a list of potential members (All)
 - b. Development of a work plan and set of issues for examination for the working group (All)

Potential Working Group Members – Initial Suggestions:

Lori Minnite, Barnard College
Allan Lichtman, American University
David Orr, Cook County Clerk (Chicago)
Judith Browne, The Advancement Project
Cathy Cox, Secretary of State, Georgia
Jonah Goldman, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights
Christopher Edley, Dean, Berkeley School of Law
Daniel Tokaji, Moritz College of Law, The Ohio State University
Spencer Overton, George Washington School of Law
Wade Henderson, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights

Re: Work Plan
Date: October 5, 2005

The following is a work plan and division of labor for the project on voter fraud and voter intimidation:

MONTH ONE (beginning the date contracts are finalized):

- I. Draft project work plan
- II. Develop list of potential members of the working group; have EAC vet and approve names (Tova, Job, EAC)
- III. Define Fraud/Intimidation (Tova and Job)
 - a. Discussion among consultants to:
 - i. Determine what we believe the parameters of the terms fraud and intimidation should be for our research purposes.
 - ii. Create a list of state and local officials, third party representatives, attorneys, scholars, etc. to interview and/or survey to assist in this process of definition
 - b. Analysis of existing research (Tova and Job)
- IV. Obtain research assistance (e.g. interns, law clerks) (EAC)

MONTH TWO:

- V. Interview individuals identified in month one about the scope of fraud and intimidation (Job and Tova);
- VI. Create working written description of what fraud and intimidation means, includes/does not include (Job and Tova)
- VII. Examine the Feasibility of Quantifying the Level of Incidence of Different Types of Fraud
 - a. Look at how we can develop a statistically sound research instrument
 - i. Discussion with political and social scientists, legal scholars in the field (Tova)
 - b. Preliminary survey of case law of recent prosecutions for fraud/intimidation (Job/law clerk)
 - c. Interviews with state and local officials, third party groups, election lawyers to assess what they believe are the most prevalent problems (Job and Tova)

MONTH THREE:

012529

- VIII. Preliminary assessment of the federal, state and local legal capacity to handle fraud and intimidation cases
- a. Case law research (Job)
 - b. Survey of current state election codes (Tova and Job)
 - c. Analysis of Department of Justice Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions work in this area (Tova)

MONTH FOUR:

- IX. Written summary of background research on voting fraud and intimidation (Tova and Job)
- X. Development of a work plan and set of issues for examination for the working group (Tova and Job)
- XI. Finalize working group membership and set meeting dates

MONTH FIVE:

- XII. Initial working group meetings

MONTH SIX:

- XIII. Develop project scope of work and project work plan
- XIV. Draft summary report describing key findings of this preliminary study of voting fraud and voter intimidation

Tova Andrea Wang, Co-Author of the Voter Fraud and Voter Intimidation Report for the Election Assistance Commission, Calls for an End to the Censorship

Over the last few weeks, there has been a developing controversy in the press and in the Congress over a report on voter fraud and voter intimidation I co-authored for the Election Assistance Commission (“EAC”). It has been my desire to participate in this discussion and share my experience as a researcher, expert and co-author of the report. Unfortunately, the EAC has barred me from speaking. Early last week, through my attorney, I sent a letter to the Commission requesting that they release me from this gag order. Despite repeated follow-up, the EAC has failed to respond to this simple request. In the meantime, not only can I not speak to the press or public -- it is unclear under the terms of my contract with the EAC whether I can even answer questions from members of Congress.

My co-author and I submitted our report in July 2006; the EAC finally released its version of the report in December 2006. As numerous press reports indicate, the conclusions that we found in our research and included in our report were revised by the EAC, without explanation or discussion with me, my co-author or the general public. From the beginning of the project to this moment, my co-author and I have been bound in our contracts with the EAC to silence regarding our work, subject to law suits and civil liability if we violate the EAC-imposed gag order. Moreover, from July to December, no member of the EAC Commission or staff contacted me or my co-author to raise any concerns about the substance of our research. Indeed, after I learned that the EAC was revising our report before its public release, I contacted the EAC, and they refused to discuss with me the revisions, or the reasons such revisions were necessary.

Stifling discussion and debate over this report and the critical issues it addresses is contrary to the mission and goals of the EAC and to the goal of ensuring honest and fair elections in this country. Commissioner Hillman stated in her defense of the EAC’s actions that the EAC seeks to “ensure improvements in the administration of federal elections so that all eligible voters will be able to vote and have that vote recorded and counted accurately.” I share this aspiration. But I believe that the best way to achieve that end is not by suppressing or stifling debate and discussion, but by engaging in a thoughtful process of research and dialogue that ultimately arrives at the truth about the problems our voting system currently confronts.

Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research Project

INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.

- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.

- With respect to DOJ's Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.
- Craig Donsanto of DOJ's Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots "for cause" only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;

012539

- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from "battleground" states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

"Dead Voters and Multiple Voting"

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

012541

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Preliminary Research

Status Report

Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research STATUTORY AUTHORITY

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research

CURRENT RESEARCH FOCUS

2 consultants (bipartisan) focused on:

- Drafting a definition of election fraud;
- Conducting background research (literature, news stories, case law, interviews of knowledgeable persons from the public and private sector); and
- Convening a working group of bipartisan and nonpartisan representatives of election officials, advocates, and the legal community to review preliminary research and brainstorm ideas for future EAC activities.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- Little of the research is truly systematic or scientific.
- Many documents make allegations but have little follow up.
- Books written about this subject seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that make them somewhat less valuable.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- There is substantial concern about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud (e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting) is a serious problem.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although one report mentions schemes against a major political party.
- Deceptive practices (e.g.: targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation) were reported to be a major problem in 2004.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex; yet may be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEWS

Consultants interviewed numerous individuals from the public and private sector who have some experience in researching, investigating and prosecuting, or observing incidents.

They included experts from the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEW FINDINGS

- Virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem.
- Vote buying and voter registration fraud are considered the next most common problems
- Some disagreement over prevalence of polling place voting fraud.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEW FINDINGS

Intimidation/Suppression –

- Biggest intimidation/suppression concerns: abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers.
- Some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities, and of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters.
- Other concerns: polling places being moved at the last moment; videotaping of voters at the polls; and targeted misinformation campaigns.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEW FINDINGS

- Common problems: badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off.
- A few people also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLES

- Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006.
- Downside: often could not verify the truthfulness of the reports or how often actual convictions result from activities reported.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

The most common allegations of voter registration fraud were:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration applications;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms, depending on the party with which the voter registered.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Dead Voters and Multiple Voting

- High number of articles.
- Often the problem resulted from administrative error: poll workers mismarking or failing to mark voter lists; flawed voter registration lists; and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Multiple Voting

- Most cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person.
- A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists.
- In many instances, person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose.
- Small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county, and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Dead Voters –

Problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained (i.e.; the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that).

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Vote Buying

- More official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas reported in this area.
- Numerous of articles, a few of which involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia).

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Deceptive Practices

- Numerous reports in 2004 of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote.

- Misinformation came in the form of
 - flyers,
 - phone calls,
 - letters, and
 - people going door to door.

- Many of the efforts reportedly targeted at minority communities.

- Disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Non-citizen Voter Registration & Voting

Few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting
– just 7 cases in 7 different states across the country:

- 1 case - charges were filed against 10 individuals.
- 1 case - judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting.
- 3 instances - prompted official investigations.
- 2 cases - remained just allegations.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Felon Voting

- 13 cases of felon voting, some involving large numbers of voters.
- In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is an administrative mistake or a crime.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research CASE LAW

Consultants reviewed cases from Federal courts and state courts of appeals from 2000 to the present.

Greatest areas of fraud and intimidation shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with:

- voter registration;
- voter identification;
- the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots;
- provisional voting;
- vote buying; and
- challenges to felon eligibility.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research WORKING GROUP

8 member working group included bipartisan and nonpartisan members, and representatives of the election official, advocacy, and legal communities

Met May 18 to review preliminary research and brainstorm ideas for future EAC action.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research WORKING GROUP IDEAS

- Conduct surveys of:
 - All state laws
 - All state election offices
 - Specific states
 - Local election officials
 - State implementation of administrative complaint procedures (applies only to HAVA Title III violations) to identify examples of procedures for other than HAVA Title III complaints
 - Voters

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research WORKING GROUP IDEAS

- Follow up on initial reports of fraud/intimidation from the Nexis search of news articles and literature review
- Research absentee balloting process issues, including methodology of “for cause” absentee voting

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research WORKING GROUP IDEAS

- Conduct risk-analysis for voting fraud & voter intimidation
 - Who?
 - What part of process?
 - Which elections?
 - Ease of committing the fraud

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research WORKING GROUP IDEAS

- Analyze
 - Phone logs from toll-free lines for election concerns
 - Federal observer reports
 - Local newspapers

- Conduct academic statistical research

- Research search and match procedures for voter registration list maintenance (subject to confirmation) to identify potential avenues for vote fraud

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research WORKING GROUP IDEAS

- Research state district court actions
- Broaden scope of interviews to include district attorneys and more local election officials
- Explore the concept of election courts
- Develop model statutes

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research

- Do we have a complete picture?
No! Preliminary research provides some pieces of the puzzle.
- Will we ever have a complete picture?
Probably not, but additional research could provide enough additional pieces so that we have a better sense of the whole picture.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEXT STEPS

- Consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations.
- Report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter.
- Report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment.
- Following this, a final report will be prepared.

U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

Status Report on the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research Project

May 17, 2006

Deliberative Process Privilege

INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.

- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud,

although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.

- With respect to DOJ's Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.
- Craig Donsanto of DOJ's Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;

- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate;
and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

p 5. 2d bullet ..DOJ is bringing fewer intimidation and suppression cases now...

This clearly is a myth. The Department has brought two 11(b) cases, one of the two in this Administration. The focus of DOJ activity has shifted, in fact, to voter suppression as there are fewer cases over voter dilution (challenges to at-large election systems, etc.) being brought by anyone as the number of jurisdictions with at-large election systems has shrunk dramatically. This Administration has, in fact, brought far more voter-suppression cases in this Administration than ever in the past, including a majority of all cases under Sections 203 and 208 of the Act, and such key recent Section 2 cases as US v. City of Boston and US v. Long County, Georgia.

The Voting Section brings cases involving "systemic" discrimination because federal voting statutes focus on discriminatory action by local governments. It is criminal statutes that involve malfeasance by individuals. The difference is fundamental and key to understanding law enforcement 3d bullet.

The Voting Section of DOJ has taken action to address badly kept voter lists with recent lawsuits in Missouri and Indiana.

4th bullet

The Voting Section of DOJ has, by a large margin, included mandatory training of poll workers in avoiding discriminatory practices in more cases in this Administration than in its entire previous history.

Page 6 - first bullet

This is not true. Ms. Wang repeatedly declined to define intimidation, so that her questions were vague and unhelpful in defining or identifying problems. The facts:

The Voting Section is bringing more cases involving discrimination and violation of minority voters rights at the polls on election day than ever in its history - than in its entire history combined. That is indisputable.

The credibility of allegations depends on their specificity and corroboration. Questions as to intimidation and vote suppression are meaningless in the absence of a definition of discrimination.

Prior enforcement has indeed changed the landscape, especially in the Southeast; however, the fact that we are bringing record numbers of cases clearly shows that discrimination is not rare.

Challenges based on race and unequal implementation of ID rules are indeed actionable and we have brought lawsuits, such as in Boston and Long County; we have not identified instances of such discrimination in which we have not taken action..

Voting Fraud – Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting Summary

Overview of Current Research Project

- Current research performed Tova Wang and Job Serebrov
 - the current research has been a challenge because of the need for the information to be collected and analyzed in a scientific manner
 - especially when working the “perception” of intimidation
- Both consultants cross-checked each others work in order to maintain a bipartisan balance
- Literature was anecdotal, not much follow-up on the articles
- No interviews with DA’s and only one interview with a judge
- Absentee ballots seemed to be the biggest problem
- The articles found that most of reported vote buying is concentrated in the Midwest and the South
- Very little non-citizen voting, dead voting and impersonation was reported

Purpose of Current Working Group

- To provide background information for current research
- To brainstorm for potential research ideas

Talking Points of Working Group

- Discussion of value of research because of the language of section 241 of HAVA; where is the methodology?
- History of the definition of “fraud”
- Most voter fraud happens outside of the polling centers
- Research must address existing problems, not perceived problems
- Intimidation is a subset of suppression, and considered to be physical or economic threat and/or coercion
- Suppression that is not a form of intimidation is intended to interfere with voting rights and the election process without physical or economic threat and/or coercion
- Department of Justice primarily investigated individual cases of voter fraud
- Risk analysis can be used as an indicator of legitimacy for the need to allocate funding to research in the area of voter fraud
- Current statewide database list will be useful in the deterrence of voter fraud

Ideas for Future EAC Activities

- Bipartisan observers/poll watchers
 - Used in the collection of data
 - Used to deter fraud
- Surveys
 - Survey of state laws
 - Specific states
 - Survey of local election officials
 - Voter surveys (this suggestion was rejected by the panel)
 - Survey state election offices
 - Survey use of administrative complaint procedures
- Follow up on initial reports of fraud/intimidation from the survey of news articles
- Better poll worker training
- Longer hours for polling centers
 - Including hours on weekends
- Fewer polling center locations
 - More qualified poll workers
- Absentee balloting process
 - Methodology of “for cause” absentee voting
- Risk-analysis for voting fraud
 - Who?
 - What part of process?
 - ease of use
 - Which elections?
- Broaden scope of interviews to local officials and district attorneys
- Analysis
 - Phone logs from toll-free lines for election concerns
 - Federal observer reports
 - Local newspapers
 - State District Court Cases
 - Determination of challenging a voter at the polls (in some states there is little or no cause required to challenge a voters eligibility)
- Academic statistical research
- Search and match procedures for voter registration list maintenance and voter fraud identification (subject to confirmation)
- Election courts
- Model statutes

RE: October 18, 2006 Letter

Dear Mr. Neas:

Your letter of October 18, 2006 requests the release of EAC's Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report. I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the purpose and status of this study.

In late 2005, EAC hired two consultants for the purpose of assisting EAC with two things: 1) developing a uniform definition of the phrase voter fraud, and 2) making recommendations on how to further study the existence, prosecution, and means of deterring such voter fraud. In May 2006, a status report on this study was given to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors during their public meetings. During the same week, a working group convened to react to and provide comment on the progress and potential conclusions that could be reached from the work of the two consultants.

The conversation at the working group meeting was lively on the very points that we were trying to accomplish as a part of this study, namely what is voter fraud and how do we pursue studying it. Many of the proposed conclusions that were suggested by the consultants were challenged by the working group members. As such, the consultants were tasked with reviewing the concerns expressed at the working group meeting, conducting additional research as necessary, and providing a draft report to EAC that took into account the working group's concerns and issues.

That draft report is currently being vetted by EAC staff. EAC will release a final report from this study after it has conducted a review of the draft provided by the consultants. However, it is important to remember the purpose of this study -- finding a uniform definition of voter fraud and making recommendations on how to study the existence, prosecution and deterrence of voter fraud -- as it will serve as the basis of the EAC report on this study.

Thank you for your letter. You can be assured that as soon as a final report on the fraud and intimidation study is available, a copy will be made available to the public.

Sincerely,

Paul S. DeGregorio

Dear Mr. Perez:

Thank you for agreeing to participate in the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting. This meeting will take place from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday, May 18th, 2006 at the offices of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), 1225 New York Avenue, NW, 11th Floor, Washington, DC.

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. Subsequently, the Commission contracted with two consultants (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

MEMORANDUM

TO: EAC Commissioners

FROM: Peggy Sims, Election Research Specialist

SUBJECT: Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting

The first meeting of the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group will take place from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday, May 18th, 2006 at the offices of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), 1225 New York Avenue, NW, 11th Floor, Washington, DC.

As you know, Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. Consequently, in September 2005, EAC contracted with two consultants (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

012606

- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

For your information, the folder accompanying this letter includes a number of items related to our consultants' preliminary research and the upcoming meeting:

- a meeting agenda;
- a list of Working Group members;
- a draft definition of election fraud;
- a list of reports and literature reviewed;
- a summary of interviews conducted and a list of experts interviewed;
- a list of experts interviewed;
- an analysis of news articles researched through Nexis;
- a summary of Department of Justice, Public Integrity Section cases, October 2002-January 2006;
- an analysis of case law review;
- a summary of research methodology recommendations from political scientists and experts in the field; and
- a CD with summaries of individual reports and literature reviewed, summaries of individual interviews, charts and summaries of news articles, and case law summary charts.

Please let me know if you have any questions.

Dear Mr. Donsanto:

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission's (EAC) requests your assistance in our preliminary research on voting fraud and voter intimidation. You are recognized for your expertise in the prosecution of election crimes. The project requires the information and insights that you can offer.

EAC is a federal agency established in accordance with section 201 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA), Public Law 107-252. Among the duties that HAVA requires EAC to perform is the conduct of studies regarding election administration issues. The election administration issues itemized in the statute include:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

The EAC Board of Advisors, established in accordance with HAVA section 211, recommended that EAC place a high priority on these topics when initiating our research projects. Subsequently, EAC obtained the services of two consultants (Tova Wang and Job Serebrov) to:

- Define Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation - develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;

012611

- Research Available Resources - perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- Establish a Project Working Group - in consultation with EAC, establish a Working Group composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation, provide a description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the background research to the group, and convene the group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic;
- Produce a Report - Provide a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and Working Group deliberations that includes recommendations for future EAC research, if any;
- Assist EAC in Initiating Future Research - if EAC decides to pursue one or more recommendations for future research, draft the project scope and Statement of Work for the Request for Proposals to be released on this research.

If you are available, our team of consultants and the EAC project manager, Peggy Sims, will contact you to set up an initial interview. This interview will focus on the identification and prosecution of offenses involving voting fraud and voter intimidations, as well as possible resources on these subjects for our consultants' review. Our consultants and project manager may have follow up questions as the research proceeds. It also would be helpful if you could participate in the meeting of the project Working Group and contribute to their discussion.

If you have any questions about the research or this request, please contact Peggy Sims by email at psims@eac.gov or by phone at 202-566-3120.

Dear Mr. Hearne:

Thank you for agreeing to participate in the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting. This meeting will take place from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday, May 18th, 2006 at the offices of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), 1225 New York Avenue, NW, 11th Floor, Washington, DC.

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. Subsequently, the Commission contracted with two consultants (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

Dear <SALUTATION> <LAST NAME>:

Thank you for agreeing to participate in the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting. This meeting will take place from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday, May 18th, 2006 at the offices of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), 1225 New York Avenue, NW, 11th Floor, Washington, DC.

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. Subsequently, the Commission contracted with two consultants (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

012622

- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

Your ideas for possible EAC activities related to this topic will help the agency as it plans future actions to meet its HAVA responsibilities.

For your information, the folder accompanying this letter includes:

- a meeting agenda;
- a list of Working Group members;
- a draft definition of election fraud;
- a list of reports and literature reviewed;
- a summary of interviews conducted and a list of experts interviewed;
- a list of experts interviewed;
- an analysis of news articles researched through Nexis;
- a summary of U.S. Department of Justice, Public Integrity Section cases, October 2002-January 2006;
- an analysis of case law review;
- a summary of research methodology recommendations from political scientists and experts in the field; and
- a CD with summaries of individual reports and literature reviewed, summaries of individual interviews, charts and summaries of news articles, and case law summary charts.

I look forward to having a productive meeting with you. If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me by email (psims@eac.gov) or by telephone (1-866-747-1471, toll free, or 202-566-3120, direct).

Sincerely yours,

Enclosures

Dear Job Serebrov

Some additional information: I have put together and run election day / ballot security programs in Oklahoma and North Carolina; I testified before the House Judiciary Committee on HAVA and also worked closely with Sen. Kit Bond's office & staff on the drafting of the Senate version of the legislation. I now serve as outside counsel to the National Republican Senatorial Committee and have been putting together the preliminary outline of the ballot security program for the 2006 election cycle, working with the Office of Public Integrity of the Dept of Justice on this very topic. Let me know if you want/need more information.

Thanks! Cleta

Re: Working Group Recommendations
Date: November 12, 2005

*Wendy R. Weiser, Associate Counsel in the Democracy Program at the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and an expert in federal and constitutional law, has done a great deal of research, writing, speaking, and litigating on voting rights and election law issues. As part of the Brennan Center's wide ranging activities in the area of democracy, Ms. Weiser is currently overseeing an analysis and investigation of recent allegations of voter fraud throughout the country.

*Barbara Arnwine is Executive Director of the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, an organization that for four decades has been at the forefront of the legal struggle to secure racial justice and equal access to the electoral process for all voters. Notably, Ms. Arnwine and the organization have led the Election Protection program for the last several years, a nationwide grassroots education and legal effort deploying thousands of volunteers and using a nationally recognized voter hotline to protect voters' rights on election day.

*Daniel Tokaji, professor and associate director of the Election Law Center at the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University, is one of the nation's foremost experts in election law and reform and ensuring equality in the voting system. Professor Tokaji frequently writes and speaks on democracy related issues at academic and practitioner conferences, on such issues as voting technology, fraud, registration, and identification requirements, as well as the interplay between the election administration practices and voting rights laws.

Donna Brazile is Chair of the Democratic National Committee's Voting Rights Institute, the Democratic Party's major initiative to promote and protect the right to vote created in response to the irregularities of the 2000 election, and former Campaign Manager for Gore-Lieberman 2000 (the first African American to lead a major presidential campaign.) Brazile is a weekly contributor and political commentator on CNN's Inside Politics and American Morning, a columnist for Roll Call Newspaper and a contributing writer for Ms. Magazine.

Wade Henderson is the Executive Director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights (LCCR) and Counsel to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights Education Fund (LCCREF), an organization at the forefront of defending voting rights for the last fifty years. Prior to his role with the Leadership Conference, Mr. Henderson was the Washington Bureau Director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)

Robert Bauer is the Chair of the Political Law Practice at the law firm of Perkins Coie, National Counsel for Voter Protection, Democratic National Committee, Counsel to the Democratic Senatorial and Congressional Campaign Committees and Co-Author, Report of Counsel to the Senate Rules and Administration Committee in the Matter of the United States Senate Seat from Louisiana in the 105th Congress of the United States, (March 27, 1997). He is the author of United States Federal Election Law, and one of the foremost attorneys in the country in the area of federal/state campaign finance and election laws.

Laughlin McDonald has been the executive director of the Southern Regional Office of the ACLU since 1972 and as the Director of the ACLU Voting Rights Project, McDonald has played a leading role eradicating discriminatory election practices and protecting the gains in political participation won by racial minorities since passage of the 1965 federal Voting Rights Act. During the past two decades, McDonald has broken new ground by expanding ACLU voting rights cases to include representation of Native Americans in various western states, and written innumerable publications on voting rights issues.

Joseph E. Sandler is a member of the firm of Sandler, Reiff & Young, P.C., in Washington, D.C., concentrating in campaign finance and election law matters, and general counsel to the Democratic National Committee. As an attorney he has handled campaign finance and election law matters for Democratic national and state party organizations, Members of Congress, candidates and campaigns. He served as general co-counsel of the Association of State Democratic Chairs, as general counsel for the Democratic Governors' Association and as counsel to several state Democratic parties.

Cathy Cox is serving her second term as Georgia's Secretary of State, having first been elected in 1998. In 2002 she earned re-election with over 61 percent of the vote, winning 146 out of 159 counties. Because of Secretary Cox's efforts Georgia has become a national leader in election reform. Her initiative made Georgia the first state in America to deploy a modern, uniform electronic voting system in every county

SECRETARY OF STATE STATE OF INDIANA

TODD ROKITA
SECRETARY OF STATE

Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita Biographical Information

At the age of 35, Secretary Rokita is the second youngest Secretary of State in the country. First elected to the third highest office in state government in 2002, Secretary Rokita served for a year as the youngest Secretary of State in the nation.

As Indiana's chief election official, Secretary Rokita continues to work on reforming Indiana's election practices to ensure Indiana's elections are as fair, accurate and accessible as possible. By embracing technology and accountability, Secretary Rokita is leading the effort to make Indiana a 21st century election administration model. Rokita serves on the nine-member Executive Board of the Election Assistance Commission Standards Board, charged by federal law to address election reform issues. Secretary Rokita has testified about Indiana's voting reform efforts before the United States Congress.

Secretary Rokita also serves as Indiana's chief securities fraud investigator. Secretary Rokita's office has uncovered investor fraud scams and helped secure numerous felony convictions and thousands of dollars in restitution.

In his role as the head of Indiana's Business Services Division, Secretary Rokita has continued making Indiana a pioneer in e-government initiatives.

As Secretary of State, Rokita visits each of Indiana's 92 counties at least once each year. Rokita continues to serve as a precinct committeeman during each election, and was recently named as one of the "40 under 40" by the Indianapolis Business Journal.

A native of Munster, he holds a law degree from Indiana University School of Law-Indianapolis and a Bachelor of Arts degree from Wabash College. At Wabash, Rokita earned distinction as an Eli Lilly Fellow. After law school, Secretary Rokita worked as a practicing attorney.

Rokita began serving in the Secretary of State's office in 1997. As the Deputy Secretary of State and in other positions, Rokita helped implement user-friendly e-government services, provided tougher securities enforcement, and championed significant election reforms.

Secretary Rokita is active in the National Association of Secretaries of State, having served in 2004 as the Chair of the Voter Participation Committee and serving in 2005 as the Vice Chair of the organization's Securities Committee.

Secretary Rokita is a member of the Director's Circle of the Indiana Council for Economic Education, the state and local bar Associations, the Knights of Columbus, and the National Rifle Association. A commercial-rated pilot, Secretary Rokita volunteers his time by flying people in need of non-emergency medical care to hospitals and clinics throughout the Midwest for treatment.

Secretary Rokita lives in Indianapolis with his wife, Kathy and they are members of St. Thomas More Parish.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

PURPOSE OF WORKING GROUP

Given the preliminary research, your expertise, and EAC's authority under HAVA, provide your ideas as to ---

WHERE DOES EAC GO FROM HERE?

Purpose is NOT to debate what other agencies or organizations should or should not be doing.

Defining Election Fraud

Election fraud is any intentional action, or intentional failure to act when there is a duty to do so, that corrupts the election process in a manner that can impact on election outcomes. This includes interfering in the process by which persons register to vote; the way in which ballots are obtained, marked, or tabulated; and the process by which election results are canvassed and certified.

Examples include the following:

- falsifying voter registration information pertinent to eligibility to cast a vote, (e.g. residence, criminal status, etc);
- altering completed voter registration applications by entering false information;
- knowingly destroying completed voter registration applications (other than spoiled applications) before they can be submitted to the proper election authority;
- knowingly removing eligible voters from voter registration lists, in violation of HAVA, NVRA, or state election laws;
- intentional destruction by election officials of voter registration records or balloting records, in violation of records retention laws, to remove evidence of election fraud;
- vote buying;
- voting in the name of another;
- voting more than once;
- coercing a voter's choice on an absentee ballot;
- using a false name and/or signature on an absentee ballot;
- destroying or misappropriating an absentee ballot;
- felons, or in some states ex-felons, who vote when they know they are ineligible to do so;
- misleading an ex-felon about his or her right to vote;
- voting by non-citizens who know they are ineligible to do so;
- intimidating practices aimed at vote suppression or deterrence, including the abuse of challenge laws;
- deceiving voters with false information (e.g.; deliberately directing voters to the wrong polling place or providing false information on polling hours and dates);
- knowingly failing to accept voter registration applications, to provide ballots, or to accept and count voted ballots in accordance with the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act;
- intentional miscounting of ballots by election officials;
- intentional misrepresentation of vote tallies by election officials;

- acting in any other manner with the intention of suppressing voter registration or voting, or interfering with vote counting and the certification of the vote.

Voting fraud does not include mistakes made in the course of voter registration, balloting, or tabulating ballots and certifying results. For purposes of the EAC study, it also does not include violations of campaign finance laws.

DRAFT

Determining a Methodology for Measuring Voter Fraud and Intimidation: Recommendations of Political Scientists

The following is a summary of interviews conducted with a number of political scientists and experts in the field as to how one might undertake a comprehensive examination of voter fraud and intimidation. A list of the individuals interviewed and their ideas are available, and all of the individuals welcome any further questions or explanations of their recommended procedures.

- 1) In analyzing instances of alleged fraud and intimidation, we should look to criminology as a model. In criminology, experts use two sources: the Uniform Crime Reports, which are all reports made to the police, and the Victimization Survey, which asks the general public whether a particular incident has happened to them. After surveying what the most common allegations are, we should conduct a survey of the general public that ask whether they have committed certain acts or been subjected to any incidents of fraud or intimidation. This would require using a very large sample, and we would need to employ the services of an expert in survey data collection. (Stephen Ansolobhere, MIT)

- 2) Several political scientists with expertise in these types of studies recommended a methodology that includes interviews, focus groups, and a limited survey. In determining who to interview and where the focus groups should be drawn from, they recommend the following procedure:
 - Pick a number of places that have historically had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 that are geographically and demographically diverse, and have had a diversity of problems
 - Pick a number of places that have not had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 places that match the geographic and demographic make-up of the previous ten above (and, if possible, have comparable elections practices)
 - Assess the resulting overall reports and impressions resulting from these interviews and focus groups, and examine comparisons and differences among the states and what may give rise to them.

In conducting a survey of elections officials, district attorneys, district election officers, they recommend that:

- The survey sample be large in order to be able to get the necessary subsets
- The survey must include a random set of counties where there have and have not been a large number of allegations

(Allan Lichtman, American University; Thad Hall, University of Utah; Bernard Grofman, UC – Irvine)

- 3) Another political scientist recommended employing a methodology that relies on qualitative data drawn from in-depth interviews with key critics and experts on all sides of the debate on fraud; quantitative data collected through a survey of state and local elections and law enforcement officials; and case studies. Case studies should focus on the five or ten states, regions or cities where there has been a history of election fraud to examine past and present problems. The survey should be mailed to each state's attorney general and secretary of state, each county district attorney's office and each county board of elections in the 50 states. (Lorraine Minnite, Barnard College)
- 4) The research should be a two-step process. Using LexisNexis and other research tools, a search should be conducted of news media accounts over the past decade. Second, interviews with a systematic sample of election officials nationwide and in selected states should be conducted. (Chandler Davidson, Rice University)
- 5) One expert in the field posits that we can never come up with a number that accurately represents either the incidence of fraud or the incidence of voter intimidation. Therefore, the better approach is to do an assessment of what is most likely to happen, what election violations are most likely to be committed – in other words, a risk analysis. This would include an analysis of what it would actually take to commit various acts, e.g. the cost/benefit of each kind of violation. From there we could rank the likely prevalence of each type of activity and examine what measures are or could be effective in combating them. (Wendy Weiser, Brennan Center of New York University)
- 6) Replicate a study in the United States done abroad by Susan Hyde of the University of California- San Diego examining the impact of impartial poll site observers on the incidence of election fraud. Doing this retrospectively would require the following steps:
 - Find out where there were federal observers
 - Get precinct level voting information for those places
 - Analyze whether there was any difference in election outcomes in those places with and without observers, and whether any of these results seem anomalous.

Despite the tremendous differences in the political landscapes of the countries examined by Hyde in previous studies and the U.S., Hyde believes this study could be effectively replicated in this country by sending observers to a random sample of precincts. Rather than compare the incumbent's vote share, such factors such as voter complaints, voter turnout, number of provisional ballots used, composition of the electorate, as well as any anomalous voting results could be compared between sites with and without monitors.

For example, if intimidation is occurring, and if reputable monitors make intimidation less likely or voters more confident, then turnout should be higher on average in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If polling station officials are intentionally refusing to issue provisional ballots, and the polling station officials are more likely to adhere to regulations while being monitored, the average number of provisional ballots should be higher in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If monitors cause polling station officials to adhere more closely to regulations, then there should be fewer complaints (in general) about monitored than unmonitored precincts (this could also be reversed if monitors made voters more likely to complain).

Again, random assignment controls for all of the other factors that otherwise influence these variables.

One of the downsides of this approach is it does not get at some forms of fraud, e.g. absentee ballot fraud; those would have to be analyzed separately

7) Another political scientist recommends conducting an analysis of vote fraud claims and purging of registration rolls by list matching. Allegations of illegal voting often are based on matching of names and birth dates. Alleged instances of double voting are based on matching the names and birth dates of persons found on voting records. Allegations of ineligible felon (depending on state law), deceased, and of non-citizen voting are based on matching lists of names, birth dates, and sometimes addresses of such people against a voting records. Anyone with basic relational database skills can perform such matching in a matter of minutes.

However, there are a number of pitfalls for the unwary that can lead to grossly over-estimating the number of fraudulent votes, such as missing or ignored middle names and suffixes or matching on missing birth dates. Furthermore, there is a surprising statistical fact that a group of about three hundred people with the same first and last name are almost assured to share the exact same birth date, including year. In a large state, it is not uncommon for hundreds of Robert Smiths (and other common names) to have voted. Thus, allegations of vote fraud or purging of voter registration rolls by list matching almost assuredly will find a large proportion of false positives: people who voted legally or are registered to vote legally.

Statistics can be rigorously applied to determine how many names would be expected to be matched by chance. A simulation approach is best applied here: randomly assign a birth date to an arbitrary number of people and observe how many match within the list or across lists. The simulation is repeated many times to average out the variation due to chance. The results can then be matched back to actual voting records and purge lists, for example, in the hotly contested states of Ohio or Florida, or in states with Election Day registration where there are concerns that easy access to voting permits double voting. This analysis will rigorously identify the magnitude alleged voter fraud, and may very well find instances of alleged fraud that exceed what might have otherwise happened by chance.

This same political scientist also recommends another way to examine the problem: look at statistics on provisional voting: the number cast might provide indications of intimidation (people being challenged at the polls) and the number of those not counted would be indications of "vote fraud." One could look at those jurisdictions in the Election Day Survey with a disproportionate number of provisional ballots cast and cross reference it with demographics and number of provisional ballots discarded. (Michael McDonald, George Mason University)

- 8) Spencer Overton, in a forthcoming law review article entitled Voter Identification, suggests a methodology that employs three approaches— investigations of voter fraud, random surveys of voters who purported to vote, and an examination of death rolls provide a better understanding of the frequency of fraud. He says all three approaches have strengths and weaknesses, and thus the best studies would employ all three to assess the extent of voter fraud. An excerpt follows:

1. Investigations and Prosecutions of Voter Fraud

Policymakers should develop databases that record all investigations, allegations, charges, trials, convictions, acquittals, and plea bargains regarding voter fraud. Existing studies are incomplete but provide some insight. For example, a statewide survey of each of Ohio's 88 county boards of elections found only four instances of ineligible persons attempting to vote out of a total of 9,078,728 votes cast in the state's 2002 and 2004 general elections. This is a fraud rate of 0.00000045 percent. The Carter-Baker Commission's Report noted that since October 2002, federal officials had charged 89 individuals with casting multiple votes, providing false information about their felon status, buying votes, submitting false voter registration information, and voting improperly as a non-citizen. Examined in the context of the 196,139,871 ballots cast between October 2002 and August 2005, this represents a fraud rate of 0.00000005 percent (note also that not all of the activities charged would have been prevented by a photo identification requirement).

A more comprehensive study should distinguish voter fraud that could be prevented by a photo identification requirement from other types of fraud — such as absentee voting and stuffing ballot boxes — and obtain statistics on the factors that led law enforcement to prosecute fraud. The study would demand significant resources because it would require that researchers interview and pour over the records of local district attorneys and election boards.

Hard data on investigations, allegations, charges, pleas, and prosecutions is important because it quantifies the amount of fraud officials detect. Even if prosecutors vigorously pursue voter fraud, however, the number of fraud cases charged probably does not capture the total amount of voter fraud. Information on official investigations, charges, and prosecutions should be supplemented by surveys of voters and a comparison of voting rolls to death rolls.

2. Random Surveys of Voters

Random surveys could give insight about the percentage of votes cast fraudulently. For example, political scientists could contact a statistically representative sampling of 1,000 people who purportedly voted at the polls in the last election, ask them if they actually voted, and confirm the percentage who are valid voters. Researchers should conduct the survey soon after an election to locate as many legitimate voters as possible with fresh memories.

Because many respondents would perceive voting as a social good, some who did not vote might claim that they did, which may underestimate the extent of fraud. A surveyor might mitigate this skew through the framing of the question (“I’ve got a record that you voted. Is that true?”).

Further, some voters will not be located by researchers and others will refuse to talk to researchers. Photo identification proponents might construe these non-respondents as improper registrations that were used to commit voter fraud.

Instead of surveying all voters to determine the amount of fraud, researchers might reduce the margin of error by focusing on a random sampling of voters who signed affidavits in the three states that request photo identification but also allow voters to establish their identity through affidavit—Florida, Louisiana, and South Dakota. In South Dakota, for example, only two percent of voters signed affidavits to establish their identity. If the survey indicates that 95 percent of those who signed affidavits are legitimate voters (and the other 5 percent were shown to be either fraudulent or were non-responsive), this suggests that voter fraud accounts for, at the maximum, 0.1 percent of ballots cast.

The affidavit study, however, is limited to three states, and it is unclear whether this sample is representative of other states (the difficulty may be magnified in Louisiana in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina’s displacement of hundreds of thousands of voters). Further, the affidavit study reveals information about the amount of fraud in a photo identification state with an affidavit exception—more voter fraud may exist in a state that does not request photo identification.

3. Examining Death Rolls

A comparison of death rolls to voting rolls might also provide an estimate of fraud.

Imagine that one million people live in state A, which has no documentary identification requirement. Death records show that 20,000 people passed away in state A in 2003. A cross-referencing of this list to the voter rolls shows that 10,000 of those who died were registered voters, and these names remained on the voter rolls during the November 2004 election. Researchers would look at what percentage of the 10,000 dead-but-registered people who “voted” in the November 2004 election. A researcher should distinguish the votes cast in the name of the dead at the polls from those cast absentee (which a photo identification requirement would not prevent). This number would be extrapolated to the electorate as a whole.

This methodology also has its strengths and weaknesses. If fraudulent voters target the dead, the study might overestimate the fraud that exists among living voters (although a low incidence of fraud among deceased voters might suggest that fraud among all voters is low). The appearance of fraud also might be inflated by false positives produced by a computer match of different people with the same name. Photo identification advocates would likely assert that the rate of voter fraud could be higher among fictitious names registered, and that the death record survey would not capture that type of fraud because fictitious names registered would not show up in the death records. Nevertheless, this study, combined with the other two, would provide important insight into the magnitude of fraud likely to exist in the absence of a photo identification requirement.

Benjamin L. Ginsberg represents numerous political parties, political campaigns, candidates, members of Congress and state legislatures, Governors, corporations, trade associations, vendors, donors and individuals participating in the political process.

In both the 2004 and 2000 election cycles, Mr. Ginsberg served as national counsel to the Bush-Cheney presidential campaign; he played a central role in the 2000 Florida recount. He also represents the campaigns and leadership PACs of numerous members of the Senate and House, as well as the Republican National Committee, National Republican Senatorial Committee and National Republican Congressional Committee. He serves as counsel to the Republican Governors Association and has wide experience on the state legislative level from directing Republican redistricting efforts nationwide following the 1990 Census and being actively engaged in the 2001—2002 round of redistricting.

In addition to advising on election law issues, particularly those involving federal and state campaign finance laws, ethics rules, redistricting, communications law, and election recounts and contests, Mr. Ginsberg represents clients before Congress and state legislatures.

Before entering law school, he spent five years as a newspaper reporter on The Boston Globe, Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, The Berkshire (Mass.) Eagle, and The Riverside (Calif.) Press-Enterprise. He has been adjunct professor of law at the Georgetown University Law Center lecturing on law and the political process.

Sandusky County Democratic Party v. Blackwell	United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit	386 F.3d 815; 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 28765	October 23, 2004	Defendant Ohio Secretary of State challenged an order of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, which held that Ohio Secretary of State Directive 2004--33 violated the federal Help America Vote Act. In its order, the district court directed the Secretary to issue a revised directive that conformed to HAVA's requirements.	On appeal, the court held that the district court correctly ruled that the right to cast a provisional ballot in federal elections was enforceable under 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983 and that at least one plaintiff had standing to enforce that right in the district court. Igartua--de la Rosa v. United States	United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit	417 F.3d 145; 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 15944	August 3, 2005	Plaintiff, a U.S. citizen residing in Puerto Rico, appealed from an order of the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, that rejected his claim that he was deprived of the constitutional right to vote for President and Vice President of the United States, and was also violative of three treaty obligations of the United States.	The putative voter had brought the same claims twice before. The court pointed out that U.S. law granted to the citizens of states the right to vote for the slate of electors to represent that state. Although modern ballots omitted the names of the electors and listed only the candidates, and in form it appeared that the citizens were voting for President and Vice President directly, they were not, but were voting for electors. 	North Carolina	24-Oct-04	2000 and 2002	The Observer found up to 180 people who were listed as having voted in both Carolinas in either the 2000 or 2002 elections. Reporters found no one who admitted to double voting and discovered plausible explanations for many of the duplications. In one case, an Army captain in North Carolina shared the same name as his father in South Carolina. The father was likely mistakenly recorded under his son's name when he cast his ballot.	AP

	Ohio	2-Nov-04	presidential	Republican attorney cites a Plain Dealer report saying more than 27,000 people are registered to vote in both Ohio and Florida and that 100 people cast votes in both places four years ago. A Dispatch investigation of the allegations found little proof of duplicate voting after comparing the Ohio and Florida state databases and conducting further research. After culling the list through those methods, the Dispatch interviewed the people left in question. This failed to turn up anyone who had ever voted twice. Many had never been to Florida; some had never lived in Ohio.	Columbus Dispatch
Summit	Ohio	8-Dec-04	local	The Director of the Board of Elections says the number of people under investigation for voting twice has decreased from 19 to 10. 	Tennessee	14-Dec-05	state senate	A second dead voter cast a ballot in the September special election held to fill the seat vacated by former state senator John Ford. Like a similar case documented earlier this week, this one involves an elderly voter who died weeks before the Sept. 15 election, an investigation by The Commercial Appeal found. Both of the suspect votes occurred in Precinct 27-1, in the heart of heavily Democratic North Memphis. Bayou La Batre	Alabama	29-Aug-04	city council	About 60 challenged ballots in a Bayou La Batre City Council contest have stirred discrimination concerns because they were all demanded from Asian-American voters. Fred Marceaux of Coden, an advocate for the Asian community, called the challenged ballots "scare tactics." By all accounts, the voters were challenged to their faces as they walked into the polling place at the Bayou La Batre Community Center. Being publicly confronted on their first trip to the voting booth visibly up-set many of those who were challenged. Until this year, Asians here have seemed reluctant to step into local politics, preferring to live as a self-contained community for the most part.	AP
	Arizona	1-Oct-04	presidential	A pollworker says that during the primary two men came in and said they were checking the polls to see if illegal aliens were voting. They said the name of their organization was Truth in Action. A voting rights advocate says the group was visiting many poll sites. The editor of the organization's website says he visited the polls wearing a black t-shirt with "US Constitutional Enforcement" on the back and the image of a badge on the front. He carried tools, a camera and a video recorder to "film all the conversations I had." He said that for the general election, if he sees "a busload of Hispanic individuals who didn't speak English and who voted," he plans to follow that bus to make sure they aren't voting more than once. 	Arizona	6-Nov-05		In Maricopa County, home to Phoenix, more than 10,000 people trying to register have been rejected for being unable to prove their citizenship. Yvonne Reed, a spokesman for the recorder's office, said Friday that most are probably U.S. citizens whose married names differ from the ones on their birth certificates or who have lost documentation. Reed said she hopes the number of rejected voters shrinks as election officials explain the new requirements. But, she said, "there will be an amount of people who we will not be able to get on the rolls because of not being able to find the right documents or just losing interest." In Pima County, home to Tucson, 60 percent of those who tried to register initially could not. Chris Roads, the elections chief there, said that all appeared to be U.S. citizens, but many had moved to Arizona recently and couldn't access their birth certificates or passports. Many of those prospective voters have since been able to register, but Roads said about 1,000 citizens are still unable to vote in this week's election because of Proposition 200 requirements. 				Racial slurs from election workers, missing bilingual ballots and unwarranted demands to check voter identification turned away Asian American voters across the nation, according to reports by the Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund. "There were racist remarks in New York City - poll workers were blaming them for holding up the lines. One of them said, "You Oriental guys are taking too long to vote," she said. Although the legal fund continues to tally its exiting poll surveys and has no firm estimate for the number of incidents, Fung said repeated requests from poll workers to check identification hindered the high turnout of Asian American voters. With their patience worn thin by the inadequacy of their voting site, many simply left without voting. Franklin County	Ohio	24-Oct-04	presidential	Dozens of Republican challenges to newly registered voters in Franklin County will be tossed out because they were not properly filed, a local elections official said yesterday. An initial review of 50 challenge forms filed by GOP activists shows 40 with an incorrect ward or precinct listed for the voter, said Michael Hackett, deputy director of the Franklin County Board of Elections. He said such mistakes will nullify requests to have people removed from the list of eligible voters. Voters whose eligibility is challenged need to prove Thursday that they're registered at their correct address. If they don't show up, elections board members can decide whether to keep them on the rolls. Franklin County Republican Chairman Doug Preisse said his party's challenges of voters' eligibility is not an attempt to deny legitimately registered people the right to cast a ballot. In Franklin County, beyond the challenges with incorrect information, it appears Republicans included some legitimately registered voters, including members of the military.	Columbus Dispatch

	Ohio	23-Jun-05	presidential	Blacks and young voters in Ohio faced widespread voter suppression - mostly because of long lines and improper identification checks - during last year's presidential election, a new report released Wednesday by the Democratic Party said. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said that while it's unclear whether the suppression was intentional or whether it influenced the election results, the party's five-month, $250,000 investigation showed that 28 per-cent of Ohio voters - and twice as many black voters - reported facing challenges on Election Day. "You have a particular ethnic group that has to wait three times as long as other voters, then clearly there is something going on that is aimed at particular precincts," Dean said at a news conference in Washington. blacks waited an average of 52 minutes to vote while white voters waited about 18 minutes. Beaufort	South Carolina	5-Nov-02		Voters in Beaufort County who only have rural route addresses or post office box numbers on their voter registration cards might face problems at the polls today, a federal lawsuit filed in Charleston late Monday alleges. The lawsuit said that poll workers could challenge these voters' ballots, and that if this happens, black voters would be disproportionately affected. The chair of the election commission said poll workers will ask these voters to identify exactly where they live, possibly by having them point out their homes on a map. He said the purpose of doing this is not to discourage or embarrass the voter, it's to ensure they get the correct ballot. He said if there is any confusion, voters will be given failsafe ballots that exclude district races but still allow voters to cast ballots in federal, state and countywide races. 	Colorado	18-Oct-04	presidential	With just two weeks before the Nov. 2 election, the state has been rocked by evidence that some voter-registration drives have submitted applications with forged signatures. In other cases, would-be voters have applied to vote as many as 40 times. At the same time, some registration drives have collected applications and then failed to submit them by the Oct. 4 deadline, prompting Secretary of State Donetta Davidson to announce the use of provisional ballots last week. At yesterday's meeting with county clerks and district attorneys, Mrs. Davidson announced procedures for accepting provisional ballots, which are issued to people who say they have registered but whose names fail to appear on the voter roll. Such ballots would be marked "VRD," for "Voter Registration Drive." The would-be voter would have to produce identification and tell when and where they registered. The ballot later would be checked against the state's voter data-bases. The clerks are referring cases that appear to be blatant fraud, such as forged signatures, to the county attorneys. Bill Ritter, the Denver district attorney, said he saw no pattern of a conspiracy to cheat.	Washington Times

Milwaukee	Wisconsin	31-Oct-04	presidential	Citing a new list of more than 37,000 questionable addresses, the state Republican Party demanded that city officials require identification from all of those voters. If the city doesn't, the party says it is prepared to have volunteers challenge each individual -- including thousands who might be missing an apartment number on their registration - at the polls. Democrats say this is a last minute effort to suppress turnout by creating long delays at the polls. This is in addition to the 5,619 bad addresses the party claimed. Steal this Vote-Dirty Elections and the Rotten History of Democracy in America by Andrew Gumbel

The bulk of the book comprises stories from United States electoral history outside the scope of this project. However, these tales are instructive in showing how far back irregular and illegal voting practices go. Cases include the 1868 New York City elections; the Tilden-Hayes election; the impact of the introduction of the secret ballot; the 1981 consent decree; the 1990 Helms campaign; the 1960 presidential election controversy in Chicago; the rise of the voting machine business, including the introduction of punch card machines; and allegations by Republicans regarding NVRA.

Steal this Vote focuses almost entirely on alleged transgressions by Republican, although at times it does include complaints about Democratic tactics. Gumbel's accusations, if credible, especially in the Bush-Gore election, would indicate there were a number of problems in key states in such areas as intimidation, vote counting, and absentee ballots. However, due to its possible biases, lack of specific footnoting, and insufficient identification of primary source material, caution is strongly urged with respect to utilizing this book for assessing the amount and types of voter fraud and voter intimidation occurring.

Stealing Elections, John Fund

In Stealing Elections, John Fund says that “Election fraud, whether its phony voter registrations, illegal absentee ballots, shady recounts or old-fashioned ballot-box stuffing, can be found in every part of the United States, although it is probably spreading because of the ever-so-tight divisions that have polarized the country and created so many close elections lately. Although most fraud is found in urban areas, there are current scandals in rural South Dakota and Texas.” Fund admits that “Democrats figure prominently in the vast majority of examples of election fraud described in this book.” He argues Republican fraud is less common because Republicans are middle class and Democrats are poor and most fraud occurs in inner cities where there are a lot of minorities. However, because of politics, state and local prosecutors are reluctant to go after fraud.

He also stipulates that Democrats and Republicans have different worldviews on voting: Democrats are concerned about intimidation and disenfranchisement while Republicans are concerned with fraud and the need to police the polls.

Fund argues that fraud has been made easier by the passage of the National Voting Rights Act because it allows ineligible voters to remain on the voter rolls, allowing a voter to vote in the name of someone else. He claims dead people, people who have moved, and people in jail remain on the voting list. He believes because of NVRA illegal aliens have been allowed to vote. Absentee balloting makes it even worse: someone can register under false names and then use absentee ballots to cast multiple votes. Groups can get absentee ballots for the poor and elderly and then manipulate their choices.

Fund goes through a number of examples of alleged voter fraud, mostly perpetrated by Democrats. For example, he claims much fraud in St. Louis in 2000, including illegal court orders allowing people to vote, felons voting, people voting twice, dead people voting, voters were registered to vacant lots, election judges were not registered and evidence of false registrations

Another case he pays a great deal of attention to are the alleged transgressions by Democrats in Indian Country in South Dakota 2002, including voter registration fraud, suspicious absentee ballot requests, vote hauling, possible polling place fraud, abusive lawyers at polling sites, and possible vote buying.

Fund criticizes and scorns “conspiracy theories” around electronic voting perpetuated by Democrats. He says that “By whipping up a frenzy of suspicion about electronic voting, Democrats will have built a platform from which, if the presidential or key Senate elections in November 2004 are close, they can launch endless lawsuits everywhere there were problems with electronic machines.”

Stealing Elections focuses almost entirely on alleged transgressions by Democrats. Fund’s accusations, if credible, would indicate that fraud such as voter registration fraud, absentee ballot fraud, dead people voting, and felon voting is prevalent throughout the country. However, due to its possible biases, lack of specific footnoting, and insufficient identification of primary source material, caution is strongly urged with respect to utilizing this book for assessing the amount and types of voter fraud and voter intimidation occurring.

The Long Shadow of Jim Crow, People for the American Way and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

This report describes the pervasive and repeated practices of voter intimidation and vote suppression that have taken place in very recent years and during contemporary American history. The most recent cases included in the report are the incident in which Florida law enforcement questioned elderly African American voters in Orlando regarding the 2003 mayoral race, which had already been resolved, shortly before the 2004 election; the 2004 Florida felon purge list; the case of South Dakota in 2004 in which Native Americans were improperly and illegally required to show photo identification at the polls or denied the right to vote, and similar improper demands for ID from minorities in other parts of the country; the use of challengers in minority districts in many locations; the challenge to the right of African American students to vote in Texas in 2004; the presence of men looking like law enforcement challenging African American voters at the polls in Philadelphia in 2003; the distribution of flyers in Louisiana and elsewhere in a number of elections over the last few years in minority areas telling them to vote on the wrong day; and the FBI investigation into thousands of Native American voters in South Dakota in 2002, which resulted in no showing of wrongdoing.

The report also points out that, "Over the past two decades, the Republican Party has launched a series of 'ballot security' and 'voter integrity' initiatives which have targeted minority communities. At least three times, these initiatives were successfully challenged in federal courts as illegal attempts to suppress voter participation based on race.

It goes on to describe the numerous instances of voter intimidation and suppression during the 2000 election, the 1990s, the 1980s and back through the civil rights movement of the 1960s, putting current efforts in historical perspective. Describing the chronology of events in this way demonstrates the developing patterns and strategic underpinnings of the tactics used over the last forty years.

The New Poll Tax: Republican-Sponsored Ballot-Security Measures are Being Used to Keep Minorities from Voting

By Laughlin McDonald

McDonald argues that “the discriminatory use of so-called ‘ballot security’ programs” has been a reoccurring scandal since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. These programs are deceptively presented as preventing voter fraud and thereby furthering good government. However, McDonald states “but far too often they [the ballot security programs] are actually designed to suppress minority voting -- and for nakedly partisan purposes.”

McDonald blames the federal government as well as the states for use of suspect ballot security programs. He cites the implementation of the U.S. Department of Justice’s in “Voting Integrity Initiative” in South Dakota as the worst example of a joint federal-state effort to prevent voter fraud. Alleged voter fraud only in counties with significant Native American populations was targeted. South Dakota Attorney General Mark Barnett “working with the FBI, announced plans to send state and federal agents to question almost 2,000 new Native-American registrants, many of whom were participating in the political process for the first time.” However, statistics show that these efforts only served to increase Native American voter participation. Native Americans “were targeted based on fraud allegations that proved to be grossly exaggerated; at the end of the investigation, only one Native American was even charged with a voting-rules violation.”

McDonald cites several other ballot security efforts that were really disguised attempts at minority voter suppression:

In Pine Bluff, Ark., Democrats accused Republican poll watchers of driving away voters in predominantly black precincts by taking photos of them and demanding identification during pre-election day balloting. Democrats in Michigan charged that a plan by Republicans to station hundreds of “spotters” at heavily Democratic precincts was an effort to intimidate black voters and suppress Democratic turnout. In South Carolina, a lawsuit filed the day before the election alleged that officials in Beaufort County had adopted a new and unauthorized policy allowing them to challenge voters who gave rural route or box numbers for their registration address. According to the complaint, a disproportionate number of those affected by the new rule would be African-American voters who lived in the rural areas of the county.

McDonald is also critical of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA). He states that HAVA “contains other provisions that may enhance the opportunities for harassment and intimidation of minorities through ballot-security programs.” McDonald specifically attacks the photo ID requirement for anyone who registered by mail but has not previously voted. McDonald argues that the ID requirement will suppress minority voting because minorities are less likely than non-minorities to have a photo ID, a photo ID is expensive to obtain and all the alternatives to photo ID present similar obstacles to minority voters. He also argues that there is no evidence that photo ID will combat voter fraud but it only really provides “another opportunity for aggressive poll officials to single out minority voters and interrogate them.”

McDonald lists some classic past ballot security efforts by the Republicans that have been abused: the 1981 gubernatorial election anti-fraud initiative leading to the well known consent decree prohibiting the Republicans from repeating this, a similar Republican effort in Louisiana in 1986 in Senator John Breaux’s race which again resulted in prohibition by a state court judge, and a similar effort by Republicans in Senator Jesse Helms 1990 reelection. This time the Department of Justice sued the Republican Party and Helm’s reelection committee, resulting in another consent decree prohibiting future ballot security programs without court approval.

McDonald indicates that the crux of the problem is lax enforcement of federal voters rights laws. He states, “there is no record of the purveyors of any ballot-security program being criminally prosecuted by federal authorities for interfering with the right to vote.” The only positive case law McDonald cited was a decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit that affirmed “an award of damages ranging from $500 to $2,000, payable by individual poll officials to each of seven black voters who had been unlawfully challenged, harassed, denied assistance in voting or purged from the rolls in the town of Crawfordsville [Arkansas].”

McDonald concludes by stating that Congress and the states should adopt “nondiscriminatory, evenly applied measures to ensure the integrity of the ballot.”

An Evaluation: Voter Registration Elections Board: Wisconsin Audit Report 05-12:
September 2005

The Joint Legislative Audit Committee of the Wisconsin Legislature required the Wisconsin Audit Report. The Report obviously does not include the 2006 statistics for statewide voter registration as required by HAVA. Wisconsin voter registration is required by statute in only 172 municipalities---those with populations of 5,000 or more. Another 167 smaller municipalities opted to maintain voter registration lists. Currently, 28.9 % of the voting-age population is not required to register before voting.

According to the Report, great variation was found in the implementation of existing voter registration laws. For example, 46 % of municipalities that responded to the survey did not send address verification cards to individuals who registered by mail or at the polls on Election Day in November 2004.

Further, only 85.3 % of survey respondents reported updating their voter registration lists to remove inactive voters, as required by law.

Current voter registration practices were determined to be insufficient to ensure the accuracy of voter registration lists used by poll workers or to prevent ineligible persons from registering to vote. The Report identified 105 instances of voting irregularities in six municipalities, including 98 ineligible felons who may have voted. The names of these individuals were forwarded to appropriate district attorneys for investigation.

Due to concerns about ineligible voting, stemming from the 2004 election, the Joint Legislative Audit Committee requested that voter registration procedures be evaluated. The following was investigated for this Report:

- * voter registration requirements and the methods by which voters register, including requirements in other states;
- * the address verification process, including the use of address verification cards to confirm the residency of those who register by mail or at the polls;
- * procedures and practices for updating voter registration lists; and,
- * the role of the Elections Board.

Wisconsin allows qualified electors to register in person, by mail, or with a special registration deputy before Election Day, and at the polls on Election Day. In municipalities where registration is required by statute, 20.3 % of Wisconsin voters registered at the polls on Election Day in November 2004. Municipal clerks rely on registrants to affirm their eligibility, including citizenship and age. However, requirements for providing identification or proof of residence vary depending on when an individual registers and by which method.

Address verification cards are the primary tool available to municipal clerks for verifying the residency of registered voters and detecting improper registrations by mail or at the polls. Statutes require that clerks send cards to everyone who registers by mail or on Election Day. However, only 42.7 % of the 150 municipalities surveyed sent cards to both groups, and 46 % did not send any address verification cards.

Statutes also require clerks to provide the local district attorney with the names of any Election Day registrants whose cards are undeliverable at the address provided. However, only 24.3 % of the clerks who sent cards also forwarded names from undeliverable cards to district attorneys. District attorneys surveyed indicated that they require more information than is typically provided to conduct effective investigations.

To ensure that voter registration lists contain only the names of qualified electors, municipal clerks are required by statute to remove or inactivate the names of individuals who have not voted in four years, to update registration information for individuals who move or change their names, and to remove or inactivate the names of deceased individuals. They are also required to notify registered voters before removing their names from registration lists. These statutory requirements are not consistently followed:

* 85.3 % of municipalities removed the names of inactive voters from their voter registration lists;

* 71.4 % sometimes or always notified registered voters before removing their names; and

* 54.0 % reported removing the names of ineligible felons.

Because of such inconsistencies, registration lists contain duplicate records and the names of ineligible individuals. For example, more than 348,000 electronic voter registration records from eight municipalities were reviewed, identifying 3,116 records that appear to show individuals who are registered more than once in the same municipality.

In six municipalities where sufficient information was available, there was 105 instances of potentially improper or fraudulent voting in the 2004 elections. These included: 98 ineligible felons who may have voted; 2 individuals who may have voted twice; 1 voter who may have been underage; and 4 absentee ballots that should not have been counted because the voters who cast them died before Election Day.

Recommendations:

* adjusting the early registration deadline to provide clerks more time to prepare registration lists;

* establishing more stringent requirements for special registration deputies, including prohibiting compensation based on the number of individuals registered;

- * establishing uniform requirements for demonstrating proof of residence for all registrants;
- * providing municipal clerks with more flexibility in the use of address verification cards;
- * Authorizing civil penalties for local election officials and municipalities that fail to comply with election laws; and,
- * implementing mandatory elections training requirements for municipal clerks.

The Report also recognized that the new HAVA registration procedures would help with existing registration problems.

Preliminary Findings of Joint Task Force Investigating Possible Election Fraud: May 10, 2005

On January 26, 2005, the Milwaukee Police Department, Milwaukee County District Attorney's Office, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Attorney's Office formed a task force to investigate alleged voting irregularities during the November 2004 elections. The purpose of the task force was to determine whether evidence of criminal fraud existed in the irregularities and, if evidence of fraud was found, to pursue criminal prosecutions.

The task force has made the following specific determinations based on evidence examined to date:

- * evidence of more than 100 individual instances of suspected double-voting, voting in names of persons who likely did not vote, and/or voting in names believed to be fake. Those investigations continue;
- * more than 200 felons voted when they were not eligible to do so. In order to establish criminal cases, the government must establish willful violations in individual instances;
- * persons who had been paid to register voters as "deputy registrars" falsely listed approximately 65 names in order to receive compensation for the registrations. The evidence does not indicate that these particular false registrations were later used to cast votes; and,
- * the number of votes counted from the City of Milwaukee exceeds the number of persons recorded as voting by more than 4,500.

The investigation concentrated on the 70,000+ same-day registrations. It found that a large majority of the reported errors were the result of data entry errors, such as street address numbers being transposed. However, the investigation also found more than 100 instances where votes were cast in a manner suggesting fraud. These include:

- * persons with the same name and date of birth recorded as voting more than once;
- * persons who live outside Milwaukee, but who used non-existent City addresses to register and vote in the City;
- * persons who registered and voted with identities and addresses that cannot in any way be linked to a real person;
- * persons listed as voting under a name and identity of a person known to be deceased; and
- * persons whose identities were used to vote, but who in subsequent interviews told task force investigators that they did not, in fact, vote in the City of Milwaukee.

The investigation found persons who were paid money to obtain registrations allegedly falsified approximately 65 names on registration forms, allegedly to obtain more money for each name submitted. There is no evidence gathered to date that votes were cast under these specific false names. Also found were more than 200 felons who were not eligible to vote in the 2004 election, but who are recorded as having done so.

An additional finding of the task force was that the number of votes cast far exceeds the total number of recorded voters. The day after the 2004 election, the City of Milwaukee reported the total number of votes as 277,344. In late November an additional 191 previously uncounted absentee ballots were added, for a total of 277,535 votes cast. Still later, an additional 30 ballots were added, bringing the total number of counted votes to 277,565. City records, however, have been unable to match this total to a similar number of names of voters who cast ballots – either at the polls (under a prior registration or same day registration) or cast absentee ballots. At present, the records show a total of 272,956 voter names – for a discrepancy of 4,609. This part of the investigation was hampered by widespread record keeping errors with respect to recording the number of voters.

In the 2004 election, same-day registrations were accepted in which the card had incomplete information that would help establish identity. For example: 48 original cards for persons listed as voting had no name; 548 had no address; 28 did not have signatures; and another 23 cards had illegible information. These were part of approximately 1,300 same-day registrations for which votes were cast, but which election officials could not authenticate as proper voters within the City. Included in this 1,300 were 141 same-day registrants from addresses outside the City of Milwaukee, but who voted within the City of Milwaukee. In several instances, the voter explicitly listed municipality names other than Milwaukee on the registration cards.

Another record keeping procedure hampering the investigation appears to be the post-election misfiling or loss of original green registration cards that were considered duplicates, but that in fact corresponded to additional votes. These cards were used to record votes, but approximately 100 cards of interest to investigators can no longer be located. In addition, other original green registration cards continue to be found.

A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the White House by David E. Johnson & Jonny R. Johnson

A Funny Thing Happened adds almost nothing to the present study. It contains no footnotes and no references to primary source material, save what may be able to be gleaned from the bibliography. The Johnsons take a historical look at United States Presidential elections from Andrew Jackson to George Bush by providing interesting stories and other historical information. Unfortunately, there are only three pages out of the entire book that touches on vote fraud in the first Bush election.

The authors assert that the exit polls in Florida were probably correct. The problem was the pollsters had no way of knowing that thousands of votes would be invalidated. But the authors do not believe that fraud was the cause of the tabulation inaccuracy. The major cause was undervotes and overvotes which, if all counted, would have altered the result, compounded by the use of the butterfly ballot in some strategic counties. Additionally, Ralph Nader's votes were primarily a bleed off of needed Gore votes. The authors accused Katherine Harris, then Florida Secretary of State and co-chair of the Bush campaign in Florida for prematurely certifying the state vote. The authors also ridiculed United States Secretary of State James A. Baker III, for using the courts to block attempts to hand count votes. Finally, the authors indicated that a mob of Republican partisans descended on the vote counters in Dade County and effectively stopped the count.

Vote Fraud, Intimidation & Suppression In The 2004 Presidential Election

American Center for Voting Rights Report

According to its website," the American Center For Voting Rights Legislative Fund was founded in February 2005 on the belief that public confidence in our electoral system is the cornerstone of our democracy... ACVR Legislative Fund supports election reform that protects the right of all citizens to participate in the election process free of intimidation, discrimination or harassment and which will make it easy to vote but tough to cheat.

Using court records, police reports and news articles, ACVR Legislative Fund presented this Report documenting hundreds of reported incidents and allegations from around the country. ACVR Legislative Fund found that thousands of Americans were disenfranchised by illegal votes cast on Election Day 2004. For every illegal vote cast and counted on Election Day, a legitimate voter is disenfranchised. This report alleges a coordinated effort by members of some organizations to rig the election system through voter registration fraud, the first step in any vote fraud scheme that corrupts the election process by burying local officials in fraudulent and suspicious registration forms. ACVR Legislative Fund further found that, despite their heated rhetoric, paid Democrat operatives were far more involved in voter intimidation and suppression activities than were their Republican counterparts during the 2004 presidential election.

In addition to recommended changes and a zero-tolerance commitment by the political parties, ACVR Legislative Fund has identified five cities as "hot spots" which require additional immediate attention. These cities were identified based on the findings of this report and the cities' documented history of fraud and intimidation. These cities are: Philadelphia, PA, Milwaukee, WI, Seattle, WA, St. Louis/East St. Louis, MO/IL, and Cleveland, OH.

Without going into great detail in this review, this Report: refutes charges of voter intimidation and suppression made against Republican supporters, discusses similar charges against Democrats, details incidents vote fraud and illegal voting and finally discusses problems with vote fraud, voter registration fraud and election irregularities around the country. The majority of this Report is an attempt to redeem Republicans and vilify Democrats.

In terms of sheer numbers, the report most often alleges voter intimidation and voter registration fraud, and to a lesser degree absentee ballot fraud and vote buying.

The Report presented the following recommendations for future action:

* Both national political parties should formally adopt a zero-tolerance fraud and intimidation policy that commits the party to pursuing and fully prosecuting individuals and allied organizations who commit vote fraud or who seek to deter any eligible voter from participating in the election through fraud or intimidation. No amount of legislative reform can effectively deter those who commit acts of fraud if there is no punishment for the crime and these acts continue to be tolerated.

- * States should adopt legislation requiring government-issued photo ID at the polls and for any voter seeking to vote by mail or by absentee ballot. Government-issued photo identification should be readily available to all citizens without cost and provisions made to assure availability of government-issued identification to disabled and low-income citizens.
- * States should adopt legislation requiring that all polling places be fully accessible and accommodating to all voters regardless of race, disability or political persuasion and that polling locations are free of intimidation or harassment.
- * States should create and maintain current and accurate statewide voter registration databases as mandated by the federal Help America Vote Act (“HAVA”) and establish procedures to assure that the statewide voter roll is current and accurate and that the names of eligible voters on the roll are consistent with the voter roll used by local election authorities in conducting the election.
- * States should adopt legislation establishing a 30-day voter registration cutoff to assure that all voter rolls are accurate and that all registrants can cast a regular ballot on Election Day and the election officials have opportunity to establish a current and accurate voter roll without duplicate or fictional names and assure that all eligible voters (including all recently registered voters) are included on the voter roll at their proper precinct.
- * States should adopt legislation requiring voter registration applications to be delivered to the elections office within one week of being completed so that they are processed in a timely manner and to assure the individuals registered by third party organizations are properly included on the voter roll.
- * States should adopt legislation and penalties for groups violating voter registration laws, and provide the list of violations and penalties to all registration solicitors. Legislation should require those organizations obtaining a voter’s registration to deliver that registration to election officials in a timely manner and should impose appropriate penalties upon any individual or organization that obtains an eligible voter’s registration and fails to deliver it to election authorities.
- * States should adopt legislation prohibiting “bounty” payment to voter registration solicitors based on the number of registration cards they collect.

America's Modern Poll Tax: How Structural Disenfranchisement Erodes Democracy

Advancement Project

The thesis of the Report, America's Modern Poll Tax, written after the 2000 election, is that structural disenfranchisement—the effect of breakdowns in the electoral system, is the new poll tax. Structural disenfranchisement includes “bureaucratic blunders, governmental indifference, and flagrant disregard for voting rights.” The blame for structural disenfranchisement is laid squarely at the feet of states and localities that “shirk their responsibilities or otherwise manipulate election systems,” resulting in voters “either turned away from the polls or their votes are thrown out.”

The interlocking practices and mechanics that comprise structural disenfranchisement are referred to a “ballot blockers” in the report. Most ballot blockers involve the structural elements of electoral administration: “ill-trained poll workers, failures to process registration cards on time or at all, inaccurate registration rolls, overbroad purges of voter rolls, unreasonably long lines, inaccurate ballot translations and a shortage of translators to assist voters who have limited English language skills.” The Report argues that a culture of indifference overlays these issues that both tolerates and excuses widespread disenfranchisement. This culture of indifference is exemplified by legislatures that do not properly fund election systems, officials that send antiquated equipment into poor and minority areas, poorly translated ballots and polling places that are not wheelchair accessible.

The data and conclusions in the Report are taken from eight sample case studies of states and cities across the country and a survey of state election directors that reinforces the findings of the case studies. Examples of state and city problems were: New York City—in six polling places Chinese translations inverted the Democrats with the Republicans; Georgia—the state computer crashed two weeks before the election, dropping thousands of voters from the rolls; Virginia—registration problems kept an untold number from voting; Chicago—in inner-city precincts with predominately minority populations, almost four out of every ten votes cast for President (in 2000) were discarded; St. Louis—thousands of qualified voters were placed on inactive lists due to an overbroad purge; Florida—a voting list purge of voters whose name and birth date closely resembled those of people convicted of felonies; and, Texas—significant Jim Crow like barriers to minority voting.

The survey of state election directors found: election directors lack the resources to effectively do their jobs and some lack the “ability or will to force local election officials to fix serious problems”; election officials are highly under funded and legislatures refuse to grant their requests for more money; due to a lack of funds, election officials must use old and inferior equipment and can't improve training or meet structural needs; election officials are generally unaware of racial disparities in voting; only three of the 50 state election administrators are non-white.

The Report “concludes that affected communities and democracy advocates should mobilize to force change.” A number of recommendations are made to protect the electoral franchise including: Federal policies that set nationwide and uniform election policies; federal guarantee of access to provisional ballots; enforcement of voter disability laws; automatic restoration of voting rights to those convicted of a crime after they have completed their sentence; a centralized data base of voters administered by non-partisan individuals; federal standards limiting precinct discarded vote rates to .25 %; federal requirements that jurisdiction provide voter education, including how to protect their right to vote; and laws that strengthen the ability of individuals to bring actions to enforce voting rights and anti-discrimination laws.

Republican Ballot Security Programs: Vote Protection or Minority Vote Suppression – Or Both?

By Chandler Davidson

As the author describes it, this Report focuses on vote suppression through “ballot security programs”:

These are programs that, in the name of protecting against vote fraud, almost exclusively target heavily black, Latino, or Indian voting precincts and have the intent or effect of discouraging or preventing voters in those precincts from casting a ballot. In some cases, these programs have been found by courts to be illegal. Still, they continue to exist in spite of strong criticism by leaders of minority communities, their allies, and voting rights lawyers.

There are several noteworthy characteristics of these programs. They focus on minority precincts almost exclusively. There is often only the flimsiest evidence that vote fraud is likely to be perpetrated in such precincts. In addition to encouraging the presence of sometimes intimidating Republican poll watchers or challengers who may slow down voting lines and embarrass potential voters by asking them humiliating questions, these programs have sometimes posted people in official-looking uniforms with badges and side arms who question voters about their citizenship or their registration. In addition, warning signs may be posted near the polls, or radio ads may be targeted to minority listeners containing dire threats of prison terms for people who are not properly registered—messages that seem designed to put minority voters on the defensive. Sometimes false information about voting qualifications is sent to minority voters through the mail.”

He further states that a most common theme of the programs over the last 50 years is that of sending white challengers to minority precincts. He says that the tactic of doing mailings, collecting returned materials, and using that as a basis for creating challenger lists and challenging voters at the polls, started in the 1950s and continues to today. The problem with this practice is that reasons for a mailing to be returned include a wrong address, out of date or inaccurate addresses, poor mail delivery in minority areas, and matching mistakes. Davidson also sets out to demonstrate through documentary evidence that the practices have been and are approved of or winked at by high ups in the party.

Davidson goes on to provide numerous examples from the last 50 years to demonstrate his thesis, going through the historical development of Republican ballot security programs from the 1950s through to the present. The author cites and quotes internal Republican letters and memoranda, primary sources and original documents, media reports, scholarly works, as well as the words of judges' rulings in some of the cases that ended up in litigation to prove his argument.

In addition to describing how the schemes really were brought to the fore in the 1964 election, he describes more recent incidents such as 1981 in New Jersey, 1982 Dallas, Louisiana 1986, Houston 1986, Hidalgo 1988 Orange County 1988, North Carolina 1990, South Carolina 1980-1990, and South Dakota 2002. (Summaries of these examples are available)

Davidson concludes with an outline of some of the features of vote suppression efforts put forth by Republicans under the guise of ballot security programs, as described in the Report, from the 1950s to the present day:

1. An organized, often widely publicized effort to field poll watchers in what Republicans call "heavily Democratic," but what are usually minority, precincts;
2. Stated concerns about vote fraud in these precincts, which are occasionally justified but often are not;
3. Misinformation and fear campaigns directed at these same precincts, spread by radio, posted signs in the neighborhoods, newspapers, fliers, and phone calls, which are often anonymously perpetrated;
4. Posting "official-looking" personnel at polling places, including but not limited to off-duty police—sometimes in uniform, sometimes armed;
5. Aggressive face-to-face challenging techniques at the polls that can confuse, humiliate, and intimidate—as well as slow the voting process—in these same minority precincts;
6. Challenging voters using inaccurate, unofficial lists of registrants derived from "do-not-forward" letters sent to low-income and minority neighborhoods;
7. Photographing, tape recording, or videotaping voters; and
8. Employing language and metaphors that trade on stereotypes of minority voters as venal and credulous.

The report ends with some observations on the state of research on the incidence of fraud, which the author finds lacking. He suggests that vote suppression of qualified minority voters by officials and partisan poll-watchers, challengers, and uniformed guards should also be considered as included in any definition of election fraud. Davidson also offers a few recommendations for reform, noting that Democrats should not protest all programs aimed at ballot integrity, but rather work with Republicans to find solutions to problems that confront both parties and the system as a whole.

Analysis of the September 15, 2005 Voter Fraud Report Submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General

By The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and Dr. Michael McDonald of George Mason University

General

A September 15, 2005 Report submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General included lists of purportedly illegitimate votes in New Jersey in the 2004 general election, including lists of 10,969 individuals who purportedly voted twice and lists of 4,756 voters who were purportedly dead or incarcerated in November 2004. For the present Analysis of the Report, the lists of voters submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General, as well as a copy of the New Jersey county voter registration files were obtained, and an initial investigation of the report's claims was conducted. The analysis shows that the lists submitted are substantially flawed.

The Analysis is based on methodology only: its authors did not gain access to original documents related to registration or original pollbook records; only recently were copies of the counties' original registration data files acquired and compiled, which contain some notable gaps; and the lists submitted to the Attorney General contain significant errors and little documentation, which complicated the analysis. Nonetheless, the analysts say that information collected is sufficient for generally assessing the quality of evidence presented to support the September 15 report. Analysis of the suspect lists reveals that the evidence submitted does not show what it purports to show: cause for concern that there is serious risk of widespread fraud given the state of the New Jersey voter registration rolls.

These suspect lists were compiled by attempting to match the first name, last name, and birth date of persons on county voter registration files. Entries that supposedly "matched" other entries were apparently deemed to represent the same individual, voting twice. This methodology was similar to the method used in compiling the notoriously inaccurate Florida "purge lists" of suspected ineligible felons in 2000 and 2004. As Florida's experience shows, matching names and birth dates in the voter registration context can easily lead to false conclusions – as was almost certainly the case here.

This Analysis reveals several serious problems with the methodology used to compile the suspect lists that compromise the lists' practical value. For example, the data used in the Report from one county appears to be particularly suspect and anomalous, and may have substantially skewed the overall results. In addition, middle initials were ignored throughout all counties, so that "J _____ A. Smith" was presumed to be the same person as "J _____ G. Smith." Suffixes were also ignored, so that fathers and sons – like "B _____ Johnson" and "B _____ Johnson, Jr." – were said to be the same person.

Underlying many of the entries on these lists, and similar lists compiled in Florida and elsewhere, is a presumption that two records with the same name and date of birth must represent the same person. As explained in this analysis, this presumption is not consistent with basic statistical principles. Even when votes appear to have been cast in two different cities under the same name and birth date, statistics show that voter fraud is not necessarily to blame. With 3.6 million persons who voted in the 2004 election in New Jersey, the chance that some have the same name and birth date is not far-fetched.

Analysis of the Claim of Double Voting by 4,497 Individuals

Attempts to match data on one list to data on another list will often yield “false positives:” two records that at first appear to be a match but do not actually represent the same person. The natural incidence of “false positives” for a matching exercise of this scale – especially when, as here, conducted with relatively little attention to detail – readily explains the ostensible number of double votes.

1,803 of these 4,397 records of ostensibly illegal votes seem to be the product of a glitch in the compilation of the registration files. These records reflect two registration entries by the same person from the same address, with a notation next to each that the individual has voted. For example, 55-year-old W_____ A. Connors, living at 253 B_____ Ave. in a New York commuter suburb, is listed on the data files with an (erroneous) first registration date in 1901 and a second registration date in 1993; Mr. Connors is thus represented twice on the data files submitted. Each of these entries also indicates that W_____ A. Connors at 253 B_____ Ave voted in 2004. There is no credible indication, however, that Mr. Connors actually voted twice; indeed, given the clearly erroneous registration date on the files, it is far more likely that data error is to blame for the doubly logged vote as well.

More plausibly, the bulk of these 1,803 records may be traced to irregularities in the data processing and compilation process for one single county: the Middlesex County registration file accounts for only 10% of registered voters in the state but 78% of these alleged double votes. The suspect lists themselves contain an acknowledgment that the problem in Middlesex is probably not fraud: 99% of these Middlesex voters are labeled on the lists submitted to the Attorney General with a notation that the record is “less likely” to indicate an illegal double vote.

Another 1,257 entries of the 4,397 records probably represent similar data errors – also largely driven by a likely glitch in the Middlesex County file, which is also vastly over represented in this category. These records show ever-so-slight variations in records listed with the same date of birth at the same address: for example, the same first and last names, but different middle initials or suffixes (e.g., J_____ T. Kearns, Sr., and J_____ T. Kearns, Jr., both born the same day and living at the same address; or J_____ E. Allen and J_____ P. Allen, born the same day and living at the same address).

Approximately 800 of the entries on the list likely represent different people, with different addresses and different middle initials or suffixes. For example, W_____ S. Smith, living in a northern New Jersey town, and W_____ C. Smith, living in another town two hours away, share the same date of birth but are not the same person. Nor are

T_____ Brown, living in a New York commuter suburb, and T_____ H. Brown, Jr., living in a small town over an hour west, despite the fact that they also share the same birth date. About three-quarters of the entries in this category reveal data that affirmatively conflict – for example, a middle initial (“W_____ S.”) in one case, and a different middle initial (“W_____ C.”) in another, listed at different addresses. There is absolutely no good reason to conclude that these individuals are in fact the same, when the available evidence indicates the contrary.

For approximately 200 of the entries in this category, however, less information is available. These entries show a middle initial (“J_____ W. Davis”) in one case, and no middle initial (“J_____ Davis”) in another – again, at different addresses. The lack of the middle initial is ambiguous: it could mean that one of the J_____ Davis in question has no middle name, or it could mean that the middle initial was simply omitted in a particular registration entry. Although these entries involve less conclusive affirmative evidence of a false match than the entries noted above, there is still no good reason to believe that “J_____ W. Davis” and “J_____ Davis,” at different addresses, represent the same person.

Of the individuals remaining, there are serious concerns with the accuracy of the dates of birth. Seven voters were apparently born in January 1, 1880 – which is most likely a system default for registrations lacking date-of-birth information. For 227 voters, only the month and year of birth are listed: this means only that two voters with the same name were born in the same month and year, an unsurprising coincidence in a state of several million people.

That leaves approximately 289 votes cast under the same name and birth date – like votes cast by “P_____ S. Rosen,” born in the middle of the baby boom – but from two different addresses. It may appear strange, but there may be two P_____ S. Rosens, born on the same date in 1948 – and such coincidences are surprisingly common. For any one person, the odds of someone else having the same name and birth date is small. But because there are so many voters in New Jersey, a sizable number will have the same name and birth date simply by chance. In a group of just 23 people, it is more likely than not that two will share the same birthday. For 40 people, the probability is 90%. Many, if not most, of the 289 alleged double votes of persons registered at different addresses most likely reflect two separate individuals sharing a first name, last name, middle initial, and birth date.

The September 15 Report makes much of the raw potential for foul play based on the unsurprising fact that there are voters who appear on the New Jersey registration rolls more than once. As noted above, many of the names identified reflect two different individuals and not simply duplicate entries. But there is no doubt that there are duplicate entries on New Jersey’s registration rolls. It is well known that voter registration rolls contain “deadwood” – registration entries for individuals no longer living at a given address or deceased. There is no evidence, however, that these extra registrations are used for widespread illegal voting. Moreover, the problem of deadwood will soon be largely resolved: both the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 and the Help America

Vote Act of 2002 require states to implement several systems and procedures as of January 1, 2006, that will clean the voter rolls of duplicate or invalid entries while protecting eligible voters from unintended disfranchisement.

Response to the Report of the 2005 Commission on Federal Election Reform

By The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and Spencer Overton, Commissioner and Law Professor at George Washington University School of Law

Introduction

On September 19, 2005, the Commission on Federal Election Reform, co-chaired by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker III, issued a report with recommendations for reforming the administration of U.S. elections. This Response addresses the main substantive flaws in the Report, refuting in detail its recommendations that “Real ID” cards be used for voter identification, that Social Security numbers be spread through interstate databases and on ID cards, and that states restore voting rights to people convicted of felony convictions only in certain cases and only after they have completed all the terms of their sentence.

Voter Identification Recommendation

According to the Response, the Report’s most troubling recommendation is that states require voters to present a Real ID card or a similar “template” ID as a condition of voting. This recommendation is more onerous than the photo ID proposal rejected by the Commission’s predecessor in 2001 and is more restrictive than any ID requirement adopted in any state to date. It would impose substantial – and for some, insurmountable – burdens on the right to vote. This ID requirement is purportedly intended to prevent “voter fraud,” and yet the Report itself concedes that “[t]here is no evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting” before asserting, without any meaningful support, that “both occur.” Not only does the Report fail to justify the creation of stringent identification requirements, but it also does not explain why the goals of improved election integrity will not be met through the existing provisions in the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA). Additionally, the Report fails to consider alternative measures to advance its goals that are less restrictive to voters.
